In a case in which the question was whether, as alleged by the defendant, he paid to the plaintiff the rent due under a lease for particular fuslis, the defendant offered evidence of payments by his servants who made them, and by the books they kept. The District Judge rejected all this evidence in a summary manner.

Held that, though the District Judge was right in holding that the books were not by themselves sufficient, he was in error in thinking that the assertions of payment by the servant were vitiated because the witness had refreshed his memory from the books (20). ———Credibility of—Probabilities of case—Consideration of— Necessity.

In this case a passage in the judgment of the trial Judge was as follows :—" A great deal has been said about the balance of probabilities. But this is not a case to be decided upon probabilities. The defendant is in possession; and is not to be ousted in the absence of good evidence. This is not a case in which the court must say it believes one side rather than the other. It disbelieves the plaintiff's evidence; and that is quite enough. That it disbelieves most of the defendant's evidence is nothing to the point."

On objection taken to the authority of the judgment founded upon the observations in the aforesaid passage, their Lordships observed as follows :—" It must be admitted that the passage is ambiguous. If it means only that where a case has been manifestly proved to be false, it is unnecessary to weigh general probabilities, the observation is a mere truism, since it is obviously idle to inquire whether it was likely a man should do that which it has been demonstrated he never did. On the other hand, if it imports that the Judge refused to weigh the probabilities of the case, because he believed one set of witnesses rather than the other, it would support the objection taken, viz., that in forming his belief he had excluded from his consideration that which ought to have entered into it (175-6). The observation that the evidence of a witness proves too much is not rebutted by the suggestion that it cannot be supposed that the witness was suborned, for, if he was possessed of common shrewdness, he would not have overdone the thing and thus have given rise to such an objection (125).

That is a very tender argument before a Court, and too doubtful to justify the Court in placing any considerable reliance upon it, for we find, happily for the ends of justice, that men do fall into these inconsistencies, and by means thereof the fraudulent character of the evidence becomes apparent (125-6). That was not done, however. ———Examination of—Opposite party—Examination in absence of—Irregularity—Objection to—Force of.

In the course of the proceedings before the Zillah Court in India, it appears that a witness, the sole surviving attesting witness to the instrument in question, was examined for the plaintiff without the presence of any vakeel, or agent on behalf of the defendant, and in the absence of the defendant himself. Other evidence was also given; but this particular evidence was certainly very material evidence in respect of the plaintiff's demand. The objection which was suggested in the petition to the Sudder Dewanny Court, and which has also been urged before us, was that such examination could not regularly or properly have taken place.

Their Lordships are of opinion that that objection, if taken in the right time and in the right place, would (to what extent may be questioned, perhaps) be an objection which ought to prevail with respect to the evidence to which it was applied (247). The only other objection, which was made to the decree, is, that there was a refusal to examine witnesses, the examination having been prayed for at the time the hearing was going on. Now, certainly, it does seem as extravagant an application as ever was made to any Court, to ask, in the midst of the hearing, that there should be a permission to examine witnesses, those witnesses having been ascertained long before; subpœnas having been issued to compel them to come in and give their evidence; those subpœnas not having been served, because they were then about to leave the place, but they might have been served immediately afterwards, and certainly it is not an application that ought to have been made to the Court (402-3). In a case in which the defendants tendered 58 witnesses in support of their case, the trial judge examined 30 of them, and refused to permit the remaining witnesses to be examined on the ground that their evidence would go only to prove the same facts deposed to by the 30 witnesses already examined. Those facts, if proved, would, however, have put an end to the plaintiff's case. The trial judge decided in favour of the plaintiff, and his decision was affirmed on an appeal.

———The appeal arose out of a suit brought by the plaintiff claiming dower which, she alleged, was settled upon her at the time of her alleged marriage with B, against the wife of B and two of his sons by that wife. The suit necessarily involved the consideration of the question of marriage, and, accordingly, two issues were settled, one raising the question whether the plaintiff had been married to B, and the other, raising the question whether the amount of dower which she claimed was really agreed upon at the time of the alleged marriage.

The witnesses who said that they were present at a marriage stated that some sixteen or seventeen years before the death of B a contract of marriage was openly made between B and the plaintiff, and that, at the time of that marriage, it was agreed that he should give her a sum of Rs. 10,000 as deferred dower. The marriage and the agreement for the dower formed one transaction.

The trial Judge came to the conclusion that the witnesses who were called to prove the marriage and agreement were entirely unworthy of credit. He therefore found both the issues against the plaintiff and dismissed the suit.

On appeal the High Court concurred with the trial Judge in his opinion of the credibility of the witnesses, so far as they sought to prove the agreement for dower; but they nevertheless reversed his finding on the issue as to marriage and held the marriage proved.

Held, that, if the witnesses were disbelieved as to the dower, it was a necessary consequence, in good sense, that they should be disbelieved as to what they said about the fact of the marriage, and that the finding of the High Court as to the fact of the marriage could not be sustained on the direct evidence.

———Government Official—Evidence of, highly improbable—Rejection of, on that sole ground.

In this case an important issue was whether plaintiff was the married wife of a Sudra Zemindar whose property she was claiming on behalf of her son as his issue. The defendants denied the factum and validity of the marriage, and attempted to prove by evidence that plaintiff had been a dancing-girl to lay foundation for rendering the marriage invalid, even if the ceremony had been gone through. Among the witnesses called by them on the issue was one A a Government Official, who deposed to the plaintiff having actually appeared and danced before him at a particular village 18 or 19 years before the date of his deposition when he went on circuit to the village with his master. From the details the witness gave as to plaintiff's name, parentage, and appearance from the above circumstance alone and from other circumstances appearing in his evidence, it was clear that his story was an utterly improbable one. Their Lordships observed that, though, as a Government official, the witness was prima facie entitled to credit as an independent and respectable person, his story, when scrutinised, appeared to bear a strong resemblance to those admissions which the wants of a case often produced.

Such testimony is very common; it is posslble in a given case that it may be true, but it is of so dangerous a nature and presents so few claims to be believed, that evidence of the kind is little regarded, even though the witness deposing to it be in no other way discredited than as one deposing to evidence on which a Court cannot rely. EVIDENCE ACT (I OF 1872)—(Contd.)

——Ss. 24 and 25—Confession to person in authority—Admissibility—English law—Questions put by person in authority—Statements in answer as to.

The ground of objection to the admissibility of the statement of an accused person, viz., that the statement was preceded by and made in answer to a question and that the question was put by a person in authority and the answer was given by a man in his custody, in so far as it is a ground at all, is a more modern one. With the growth of a Police force of the modern type, the point has frequently arisen in England, whether, if a Policeman questions a prisoner in his custody at all, the prisoner's answers are evidence against him apart altogether from fear of prejudice or hope of advantage inspired by a person in authority. Logically these objections all go to the weight and not to the admissibility of the evidence. What a person having knowledge about the matter in issue says of it, is itself relevant to the issue as evidence against him. That he made the statement under circumstances of hope, fear, interest or otherwise strictly goes only to its weight. Even the rule which excludes evidence of statements made by a prisoner, when they are induced by hope held out, or fear inspired by a person in authority, is a rule of policy (997).

The English law on the point is still unsettled. Many judges, in their discretion, exclude such evidence, for they fear that nothing less than the exclusion ot all such statements can prevent improper questioning of prisoners by removing the inducement to resort to it. Others, less tender to the prisoner or more mindful of the balance of decided authority, would admit such statements, nor would the Court of Criminal appeal quash the conviction thereafter obtained, if no substantial miscarriage of justice had occurred (1000). If the view that the words in S. 34, "books of account regularly kept in the course of business" are confined to books entered up from day to day, or from hour to hour, as transactions take place, were correct, merchants' and bankers' books regularly kept would in many cases be excluded from being used as corroborative evidence. ———Creditor's books called for by debtor—Admission of books in toto in case of—Necessity.

The suit was on a debt bond which recited that a portion of the amount for which it was executed was an old debt, and that the other portion was a new debt contracted at the time of the bond. The defendant, who denied that the latter amount was advanced at the time of the bond, called for the plaintiff's books of account. When produced, those books showed the whole transaction between the parties, and that the new debt was advanced at the time of the bond.

The Sub-Judge allowed the items proved by the account books, wherever they were corroborated, but disallowed them where they were not. The High Court, on the other hand, held that the books must be admitted in toto.

Held, that the High Court were entirely right (146).

The principle on which the Sub-Judge acted would have been correct if the plaintiff had relied upon his own books as proving his debt. But he did not do so. He relied upon the bond executed by the defendant, and unless that is displaced there is no answer to the suit. The defendant sought her defence in the books of the plaintiff. She called for the books and extracted her defence out of them, and it would be a monstrous thing if the party were allowed to call for the books of the plaintiff, and extract from them just such items as proved matters of defence on her part, and were not to allow those items which make in favour of the plaintiff (146). ———Revenue records—Entry of family in, as Khayyat Mohal—Weight due to—Proof of correctness of entry—Necessity.

The appellate Court found that in the Revenue Records, the plaintiffs' family had been shown, since 1852, as holding land, their caste being described as Khayyat Mohal—and there were, in evidence, extracts from the settlement records of the district in question for 1853, in which the grand-uncle and grandfather of the plaintiff were put down, as owners of 25 ghumaons of land, in the village of S, their quaum being mentioned in khayyat (Mahomedan) and got as Mohal. Similar entries were to be found, in relation to the Settlement of 1882. It was admitted by the appellate Court that if those records truly described the plaintiffs' family as Mohals, it would prove the plaintiffs' right in the action; but they attempted to dispose of that evidence, by saying "there is no proof that whoever first caused this entry to be made had any real title to the use of the term Mohal."

Held, that evidence of that character, taken from public records, for a series of years since 1852 and recorded in accordance with the requirements of the law, could not in a pedigree case be disregarded for the reason stated by the appellate Court (302-3).

No evidence is given and no suggestion is made that such entries were false, or that there was any existing reason, why deliberately false entries should have been made. In such a case as the present, statements in public documents are receivable to prove the facts stated on the general grounds that they were made by the authorised agents of the public, in the course of official duty and respecting facts, which were of public interest, or required to be recorded, for the benefit of the community. In many cases, indeed, in nearly all cases, after a lapse of years, it would be impossible to give evidence that the statements contained in such documents were in fact true, and it is for this reason that such an exception is made to the rule of hearsay evidence (303). The question was whether the suit hoondies were really drawn by the defendant or were forgeries, as pleaded by him.

Before the Sub-Judge no comparison of undoubted handwriting with the disputed handwriting was made. What was done was this: The judge made an officer of the Court read out one of the hoondies while the defendant sat in Court and wrote it from dictation; he then referred the documents to two pleaders for comparison; they reported that the papers were not in one and the same hand; the judge agreed with them, and so decided against the genuineness of the hoondies in suit.

Held, that it was obvious that such a test as that would at best be hardly adequate; and that it might be actually misleading, because the defendant would have a motive for disguising his hand (8-9). (Lord Hobhouse.) TEWARI JASWANT SINGH v. LALA SHEO NARAIN.

In 1802, two new zemindaries were carved by the Government out of the ancient zemindary of Nuzvid, of which the zemindary of Nuzvid newly constituted was granted under a sunnud, dated 8th of December, 1802, to R, and the other, Nidadavolu, was granted to his elder brother V. The question arose whether, on the proper construction of the sunnud of 8th December, 1802, the newly constituted zemindary of Nuzvid was subject to the same rule as regards impartibility and inheritance as that to which the entire ancient zemindary was subject. Their Lordships were of opinion that, in considering the effect of the sunnud, reference might be had to a letter of the then Collector of the District to the Secretary of the land revenue settlement division, dated the 25th of July, 1802, in which he submitted a plan for the division of the ancient zemindary of Nuzvid and offered an opinion as to the respective claims of V and of R, preparatory to the introduction of the permanent settlement.

Held, that the copy of the letter filed with the Board of Revenue was an official record, and that the official copy of that copy was under the circumstances admissible in evidence (49). S. 86 of the Evidence Act which says that, if a copy of a foreign judicial record purports to be certified in a given way, the Court may presume it to be genuine and accurate, does not exclude other proof.

An official in the Sikhur Court, examined as a witness, spoke of a litigation there between R and C, and said that in his presence the evidence of C was taken by the Judge of that Court, and that in his presence the suit was adjudicated and the order passed. He (the official in the Sikhur Court) put in a document which he swore was a copy of C's deposition, and was in the handwriting of one of the Court amla. It was indorsed, "copy corresponding with the original," which was in the handwriting and bore the signature of the Sheristadar of that Court.

The High Court excluded all the Sikhur proceedings on the ground that they were not proved according to the mode mentioned in S. 86 of the Evidence Act. On appeal, held, that the assertion of the official in the Sikhur Court that R sued C, and that C gave evidence before the Judge in his presence, was primary evidence of the matters ; that his proof of the Sikhur records was secondary evidence ; and that by Ss. 65 and 66 of the Evidence Act secondary evidence might be given of public documents, which the Sikhur records were, without notice to the adverse party, when, as in the case before their Lordships, the person in possesion of the document was out of the reach of or not subject to the process of the Court. EVIDENCE ACT (I OF 1872), S. 92—(Contd.)

———Deed—Nature real of transaction embodied in—Intention of parties—Acts and conduct of parties—Evidence of—Admissibility.

Under S. 92 of the Evidence Act, oral evidence is not admissible for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of parties to written documents, and the cases in the English Court of Chancery of which Lincoln v. Wright may be taken as the type have not any application to the law of India as laid down in the Acts of the Indian Legislature. Whenever therefore a question arises as to the nature of a transaction embodied in a document or documents, the case must be decided on a consideration of the contents of the documents themselves with such extrinsic evidence of surrounding circumstances as may be required to show in what manner the language of the document is related to existing facts. Evidence relating to the acts and conduct of the parties as distinguished from oral evidence and conversations constituting in themselves some agreement between them is equally inadmissible in such cases. The language of S. 92 in terms applies and applies alone "as between the parties to an instrument or their representatives in interest." ———Sale-deed—Evidence that to knowledge of vendee property sold belonged to a third party, that vendor was only mortgagee thereof, and that sale was intended to operate only as transfer of that mortgage—Admissibility—Proviso—Effect.

Equity forbids a person to deal with an estate which he knows that he holds in security as if he held it in property. Where, therefore, A purported to make an absolute conveyance in favour of B of property which really belonged to C and in which he had only the interest of a mortgagee under a mortgage created by C, held, in a suit for possession of the property by B, evidence was admissible to show that, to the knowledge of B, C was the real owner of the property and A had only a mortgage thereof from C, and that the deed of conveyance was intended to operate only as a transfer of that mortgage.

If S. 92 of the Evidence Act applied, proviso 1 would seem to be in point, because it would be a fraud to insist upon a claim to property arising under such a transaction, the claimant knowing that the true owner had never parted with it. But S. 92 does not apply, because the evidence, the admissibility of which is in question, is evidence going to show what were the rights of a third person, namely, C in the property. If a purchaser for onerous consideration and without notice had been the grantee under a deed of absolute conveyance, a totally different set of considerations would have arisen. In the present case, however, both grantor and grantee were dealing with the property of an owner who was a third person, who was not in the language of the statute either a party to the instrument or a representative in interest of a party to the instrument. The evidence led as to that third party's rights is admissible, and, if admissible, is most relevant. (Lord Shaw.) MAUNG KYIN v. MA SHWE LA. (1917) 44 I. A. 236 = 45 C. 320 = 6 L. ———Sale-deed—Intention that it should operate only as transfer of mortgage—Evidence of—Admissibility.

The action was brought to recover possession of certain parcels of land. The respondents (plaintiffs) claimed under certain deeds which purported to be absolute conveyances, but which the appellants (defendants) contended were meant to be, and had always in fact been, treated by all the parties concerned as mortgages only. The appellants' case was that the respondents knew that the property belonged to a third person, and that they (appellants) were merely mortgagees thereof, so that the deeds under which the respondents claimed were in truth mere transfers of mortgages, and not absolute conveyances.

EVIDENCE ACT (I OF 1872), S. 92—(Contd.)

In support of their case, the appellants tendered evidence relating to the acts and conduct of the parties as distinguished from evidence of oral statements and conversations constituting in themselves some agreement between them. Its object was to show that whatever the terms of the documents might be, none of the parties had acted on them as effecting an absolute sale, but that through a long course of mutual dealings materially affecting their respective positions they had always treated the business between them as one of loan secured by mortgage (153).

The evidence tendered by the appellants was excluded by the Courts below under S. 92 of the Evidence Act.

On appeal, their Lordships, without expressing any opinion on the construction or application of S. 92 of the Evidence Act in relation to the deeds in question, held that the rejected evidence should be heard, subject to any objections the respondents might be advised to take (154).

The case for the appellants disclosed a charge of fraud against the respondents in relation to matters antecedent to the deeds in question, on which much of the evidence tendered would certainly be material. Thus it is said that the respondents took absolute conveyances of property from the appellants with notice that they in fact belonged to a third person, namely, the alleged mortgagor to the appellants. If this be so, S. 92, even if construed according to the respondents' contention, will not avail them (153). The evidence of the third person, the alleged mortgagor to the appellants, is of course material and necessary on this point (154). The fact that A had not objected to a charge of compound interest in accounts which for several years he had annually received from B affords sufficient evidence of a promise by him to pay interest in that manner (23).

The defendants, under the name of D.J. & Co., carried on business, their bankers were the plaintiff bank, and the suit was brought (in 1915) by the bank to recover from the defendants a balance due by them to the bank and interest on that balance.

For several years, at least from 1906, the bank had allowed the defendants' firm to overdraw their account. The practice was that annually on December 1, the defendants, in the name of their firm and individually, signed a letter in a printed form addressed to and given to the bank, and in accordance with those letters the bank allowed the defendants' firm to overdraw their account.

The bank invariably struck a balance of its customer's accounts on the last day of each month, and charged interest on the amount of that balance. The interest so charged was added to the monthly balance, and the resultant balance, which included the interest, was carried forward to the debit of the customer as the balance due on the 1st of the following month. The pass-book of the defendants with the bank showed clearly that that was the way in which interest was computed and charged in their account with the bank. The defendants never, until August 1, 1914, raised any objection to that principle of charging them compound interest or to compound interest being charged by the bank on their overdrafts.

Held, that the defendants must be deemed to have impliedly agreed to pay compound interest with monthly rests, and that S. 92 of the Evidence Act did not prevent the bank from proving that agreement (23). ———Pro-note—Liability under—Satisfaction of—Oral agreement as to—Admissibility in evidence of—Proof of—Onus—Quantum.

Under Proviso 2 to S. 92 of the Evidence Act, the maker of a promissory note may, in a suit upon the note, set up a separate oral agreement as to any matter on which the document is silent and which is not inconsistent with its terms. Such oral agreement must be clearly proved, and the onus of doing so lies on the party setting it up. He must substantively prove such agreement (108).

M, the plaintiff-respondent, sued the defendant-appellant on a promissory note given jointly by the defendant and one H for Rs. 50,000. Before July, 1907, M had made advances to H amounting in all to 4 lakhs of rupees. The advances were partially but not wholly covered by security. In July, 1907, H applied for a further advance of a lakh and a half in order to pay off the defendant a debt of that amount due to him. M agreed to make the loan in three equal instalments. Two of these instalments were paid and the money handed on by H to the defendant, and the third instalment fell to be paid on January 30, 1908. At the end of December, 1907, the defendant was in want of money. He accordingly applied to H to ask if the balance of the debt, namely, Rs. 50,000, could be paid immediately. H then approached M, who consented to prepay his instalment on the ensuing January 30 on being given a joint promissory note by H and the defendant. The suit note was accordingly executed by the defendant and H on December 23, 1907, and the money was handed to the defendant.

In defence to the suit, the defendant alleged that at the time the suit note was made it was orally agreed between the parties that upon January 30, 1908, the Rs. 50,000 agreed by M to be advanced to H should be held as made by the money paid under the note, and that the liability upon the note should be satisfied by a fresh note to be given to M by H.

Held, that the oral agreement pleaded was one in terms of proviso 2 to S. 92, and that it was accordingly admissible in evidence (107-8). (Lord Dunedin.) MOTABHOY MULLA ESSABHOY v. MULJI HARIDAS.

Held, that extrinsic evidence was rightly admitted to explain the facts.

It is obvious that without such explanation it would have been impossible to reconcile the statement in the body of the agreement on which the plaintiffs rested their case, with the recital in the schedule on which the defendant relied as amounting to an assurance in respect of the area that was intended to be conveyed to him, and which he in fact purported to buy. The question, however, was whether A had survived his father, or had predeceased him.

The plaint alleged that A left Rangoon (the place of the parties) in or about the year 1870 as a mendicant or fakir, and had not since that date returned to Rangoon; that the plaintiff last heard of him in or about the year 1886 or 1887, when he was reported to be in Bangkok, Siam; that he had not since been heard of, and, according to the presumption of law, his death took place about 1894. ———Person not heard of for more than 7 years—Date of death of—Presumption.

The question whether a suit instituted in 1916 was barred by limitation or not depended upon the date of the death of B. From the evidence it appeared that B was last heard of in 1895, and was not heard of subsequently.

Held, that on those facts there was no presumption as to B being dead either in 1902 or 1904, and that the only presumption was that when the suit was instituted in 1916 B was no longer alive (31).

There is no presumption at all as to when B died. That, like any other fact, is a matter of proof (31). It is constantly assumed that where the period of disappearance exceeds seven years, death, which may not be presumed at any time during the period of seven years, may be presumed to have taken place at its close. This, of course, is not so. The presumption is the same if the period exceeds seven years. The period is one and continuous, though it may be divisible into three or even four periods of seven years. Probably the true rule would be less liable to be missed, and would itself be stated more accurately, if, instead of speaking of a person who had not been heard of for seven years, it described the period of disappearance as one "of not less than seven years" (32). No direct evidence was forthcoming to show that the certificate was ever signed by the Collector in compliance with the requirements of the Act; but the District Judge found, as a matter of fact, that it had been signed, applying the maxim Omnia rite et solemniter acta. According to the learned Judge's own shewing, however, the circumstances of the case were not very favourable to the presumption. Of one writing produced, he said: "Like everything else which has come under my cognizance from a road-cess office, it is a most slovenly document." The certificate in question he did not seem to have regarded as an exception from the general rule. He described it as drawn up " in the usual slovenly manner "; and he ascribed the error of inserting the ladies' names as debtors, after mutation in the land register, to " oversight and general slovenliness."

Held that, in the circumstances of the case, it ought not to be presumed that, as originally prepared, the document was completed by the Collector's signature (75).

When the extant parts of an incomplete writing exhibit such traces of careless preparation, their Lordships think it would be straining the maxim too far to presume that the parts which have disappeared must necessarily have been free from error (75). (Lord Watson.) MAHOMED ABDOOL HAI v. GUJRAJ SAHAI. (1893) 20 I. ———Documents not forming part of party's case but likely to be useful to his opponent—Non-production of.

It is open to a litigant to refrain from producing any documents that he considers irrelevant ; if the other litigant is dissatisfied it is for him to apply for an affidavit of documents, and he can obtain inspection and production of all that appears to him in such affidavit to be relevant and proper. If he fails so to do, neither he nor the court at his suggestion is entitled to draw any inference as to the contents of any such documents. It is for the litigant who desires to rely upon the contents of documents to put them in evidence in the usual and proper way ; if he fails to do so no inference in his favour can be drawn as to the contents thereof (206-7).

In a case in which the question was whether a purchase of property by a Hindu taluqdar in the name of his Mahomedan mistress was a benami transaction or was intended to benefit her, the High Court, in deciding that the purchase was intended to benefit the mistress, attached great significance to the non-production (by the opposite party) of the books showing the accounts of the general estate, and drew an inference therefrom adverse to the party alleging that the transaction was only a benami transaction.

Held, that the inference was unwarranted (206).

These books do not necessarily form any part of the plaintiff's case ; it is of course possible that some entries might have appeared therein relating to the property purchased. There is no ground for any inference such as is made in the High Court that the books if produced would have shown rent credited to the mistress or set off against some claim against her. They related to a different property, and the possibility of entries relating to the property purchased therein is very remote, but even if it had been greater, the Court was not entitled to draw any such inferences (206-7). When an important letter is not produced, and no explanation is given for its non-production, an inference naturally arises, either that the letter, if written, does not contain that which it is represented to contain, and therefore that it would not suit the purpose of the party to produce it, or that no such letter ever existed (15). ———Party to suit — Non-production by, relying upon abstract doctrine of onus of proof on plaintiff in ejectment.

In a suit brought against a Zemindar for the recovery of possession of some bighas of agricultural land lying within the ambit of a mauza in the defendant's zemindary, the defendant withheld the best evidence in his possession which would have clearly helped the Court in deciding the case one way or another. In the defendant's failure to produce documents presumably available and probably decisive one way or another if examined, the Judges of the High Court saw a design on the part of the defendant to take advantage of the abstract doctrine of burden of proof upon a plaintiff in ejectment.

Held, agreeing with the High Court, that the excuses made by the defendant for the non-production of the documents in his possession were unsatisfactory and unreliable, and that their non-production was due to the fear that, if produced, they would either establish the plaintiff's claim or would lead to a successful claim, albeit in another suit, which would be more serious for the defendant than that made in the suit out of which the appeal arose.

———Party to suit—Stranger—Distinction.

Third parties have no responsibility for the conduct of a suit and may therefore refrain from producing important documents in their possession or giving material information, trusting to the abstract doctrine of onus of proof. With regard to the parties to the suit, however, it is an inversion of sound practice for those desiring to rely upon a certain state of facts to withhold from the Court the written evidence in their possession which would throw light upon the proposition. In a case in which a party to a suit refrains from producing material documents in his possession the court may presume that the documents if produced would be against him. ———Zemindar—Rent — Enhancement of — Suit for — Tenure on which lands held—Evidence showing—Non-production by Zemindar of.

The respondent brought a suit against the appellants to enhance the rent of certain lands held by the appellants within the respondent's Zemindari, treating the appellants as ryots, having a right of occupancy in the lands at a variable rent. The appellants, on the other hand, contended that they were Shikmi talookdars; that they and their ancestors had become so many years before the Decennial Settlement; and that they held the talook at a fixed rent. It was found as a fact that the tenure of the appellants was a dependent talook, within the meaning of S. 51 of Regulation VIII of 1793. Their Lordships were also of opinion that the respondent had failed to show that the talook was held at a fluctuating rent; or that she was entitled to enhance the rent, which was proved to have been paid at a uniform rate for many years. The respondent rested upon the supposed defects in the appellant's proof, and abstained from giving evidence of the truth of her own case, which evidence she could, if it had been in her favour, have produced. In commenting upon that conduct of the respondent, their Lordships observed as follows:—"If the respondent's case were a true one, she would have had little difficulty in proving it. She does not come into Court as the purchaser at a sale for arrears of revenue, who rests upon a statutory title, with no documents to support it. She derives title from the Zemindar with whom the Decennial Settlement was effected; and she has presumably a right of access to all the records of the Zemindari. Her determination in such circumstances to rest upon the supposed defects in the appellants' proof, and to abstain from giving evidence of the truth of her own case, affords strong grounds for supposing that she had, in fact, no such evidence to give. If such evidence were forthcoming, and she has neglected to give it, she must take the consequences of her own miscarriage" (269). (*Sir James W. ———Zemindari — Tenure of lands within — Kabuliyat showing — Non-production by Zemindar of—Patta with tenant not produced by him—Inference in case of.

Where the question was whether the suit property was, as contended by the defendant, the Maharaja of Chota Nagpore, a mere jagir or tenure resumable on failure of the direct male line of the holder, or, as contended by the plaintiff, an independent estate held by the ancestors of the plaintiff's mortgagor and was incorporated in the Zemindari of the Maharajah of Chota Nagpur, as a shikmi or defendant taluk, with its revenue payable through the Maharajah, the non-production by the defendant of the kabuliyat executed by the jagirdar in favour of the then Zemindar was commented upon by the plaintiff and by the trial Judge. It was said that the kabuliyat, if produced, would disprove the defendant's case, and that it was deliberately withheld by the defendant because it would have supported the plaintiff's contention.

Their Lordships observed there were two clear answers to that argument (152-3).

In the first place, a kabuliyat, predicates a patta. A patta is granted by the Zemindar as a title-deed to the tenant. The kabuliyat, as its name implies, is a mere acknowledgment, an engagement by the tenant to carry out the terms of the patta. If the jagirdar in question entered into a kabuliyat it may be inferred with certainty that there was also a patta; and that patta, as the title-deed of the grantee, would be in the hands of the grantee's heirs and successors, and would, it may safely be presumed, come into the hands of the mortgagee, the plaintiff, who derives his title from the mortgagor (152-3). within 5 days, he would return the lease deed and take back the amount actually advanced. The question was as to the genuineness of the agreement set up by the defendant. A number of circumstances made the genuineness of the agreement improbable, and yet the defendant contended himself with examining a number of witnesses to prove its execution, and did not examine himself.

Held, that the failure of the defendant to examine himself was an important circumstance in considering the genuineness of the agreement (401).

All the facts were within his knowledge, and yet he did not tender himself as a witness to strengthen the evidence which both from the station of the witnesses produced by him, and from the general character of their testimony, is extremely untrustworthy (401). Five witnesses, two of whom were cited by both sides, deposed that the seal was affixed to the ikrar by the plaintiff himself in their presence, and there was no opposing evidence. The true object to be achieved by a Court of Justice can only be furthered with propriety by the testimony of the party who personally knowing the whole circumstances of the case can dispel the suspicions attaching to it. The story can then be subjected in all its particulars to cross-examination. To say that the party would likely have repeated what she had already said omits the entire force of the consideration as to cross-examination.

Where, therefore, in a case in which a party who ought to have gone into the witness-box did not do so, and the High Court observed that that was immaterial because she had made a full statement before the mutation officer and was only likely to have repeated what she had already said, their Lordships disapproved of such reasoning. ———S. 114, Ill. (i)—Bond—Production by obligor with endorsement of payment by obligee—Effect.

In a suit for sale on a mortgage, the plaintiff, at the time of the institution of the suit, produced only a copy of the document sued upon, alleging that the original had been lost. The defendant in his answer admitted its execution, but alleged that the debt was discharged. In support of his allegations he produced the original document containing the indorsement of payment by the mortgagee and her agent.

Held that, in view of the presumption under S. 114 of the Evidence Act, the Subordinate Judge was right in holding that the production by the defendant of the bond with the indorsement of payment cast on the plaintiff the burden of establishing the affirmative proposition that the debt was still oustanding, in other words, of showing that the bond came into defendant's possession by dishonest means and that the signatures to the indorsement were either forgeries or unauthorized (190).

Prima facie, the presumption is, where you find the instrument of a debt and the security for that debt in the hands of the debtor, that the debt has been discharged. That presumption is a strong one, and the burden of proof is upon the creditor to rebut that presumption.

In a suit upon a promissory note, both the suit note and the security which was given for its payment, being some title-deeds of lands, were in the hands of the defendants. Held that, though that circumstance raised a strong presumption of discharge, the plaintiff had adduced sufficient evidence to rebut that presumption. In a suit by the appellant claiming payment or sale under a mortgage bond executed by the respondent, the question was whether the debt had been truly discharged, and the bond returned to the mortgagor.

Held, that the initial burden of proof rested upon the appellant, both on general grounds and by reason of the provisions of S. 114 of the Evidence Act, but that that burden was one which shifted easily as the evidence was developed.

Held further, reversing the Court below and affirming the trial Judge, that the appellant had discharged the onus which lay upon him of proving that the bond had not been duly discharged and returned. (Viscount Haldane.) KUNDAN LAL v. MUSAMMAT BEGUM-UN-NISSA.

EVIDENCE ACT (I OF 1872), S. 114, Ill. (i)—(Contd.)

In a suit upon a mortgage bond the defendants pleaded discharge, and relied in support of their plea on the fact that the mortgage bond had come into their possession with an endorsement of discharge. The plaintiff's father had admittedly lent the money and taken the mortgage bond in the name of his son, the second plaintiff. The endorsement of discharge which the document bore was one made by the father. At the time of the execution of the mortgage bond the mortgagor deposited with the plaintiffs the title-deeds of the mortgaged property, and they were with the plaintiffs even at the date of suit.

Held, that the fact that the mortgagors did not take back the title-deeds at the time of the alleged discharge when, according to them, the document itself was returned to them, considerably weakened the presumption in their favour arising from the possession of the mortgage document. ———Estoppel—Meaning of.

The word "estoppel" is not infrequently used to cover transactions to which it has no proper application. ———Intentionally—Meaning of.

A person who, by his declaration, act, or omission, had caused another to believe a thing to be true and to act upon that belief, must be held to have done so "intentionally" within the meaning of the statute, if a reasonable man would take the representation to be true, and believe it was meant that he should act upon it (219). Intentionally—Use of, instead of "Wilfully."

———Effect.

It was said in I. L. R. 7 Mad. 8 that the substitution in S. 115 of the Evidence Act of the word "intentionally" for the term "wilfully" in the rule stated in the English decisions showed that the design of the framers of the Evidence Act was to exclude cases from the rule in India to which it might be applied under the terms in which it had been stated by the English Courts. Their Lordships are unable to agree in this view. On the contrary, as the rule had been modified in England by there substituting the word "intentionally" in the rule established for the word "wilfully" which had been previously used, it seems to their Lordships that the term "intentionally" was used in the Evidence Act for the purpose of declaring the law in India to be precisely that of the law of England. Further the word "wilfully" used in the earlier English decisions was really equivalent to "intentionally" (218-9). (Lord Shand.) SARAT CHUNDER DEY v. GOPAL CHUNDER LAHA. (1892) 19 I. ———Representation—Plea based on—Maintainability—Existing fact—Intention to do something in future—Representation of—Distinction.

It has been well established by a long line of authority that in order to support a plea of estoppel by representation, the representation must be a representation of an existing fact. A promise or a representation of an intention to do something in the future is entirely insufficient, and this, though Lord Bowen said that the state of a man's mind was as much a fact as the state of his digestion (34). (Lord Atkinson.) YORKSHIRE INSURANCE CO. v. THOMAS BRAINE. (1922) 32 M. L. T. 25 (P. C.).

———Representation—Plea based upon—Maintainability—Intention to deceive or knowledge of untruth of representation unnecessary—Prejudice to opposite party enough.

S. 115 does not make it a condition of estoppel resulting that the person who by his declaration or act has induced the belief on which another has acted was either committing or seeking to commit a fraud, or that he was acting with a full knowledge of the circumstances, and under no mistake or misapprehension. The law of England gives no countenance to the doctrine that in order to create estoppel the person whose acts or declarations induced another to act in a particular way must have been under no mistake himself, or must have acted with an intention to mislead or deceive. What the law and the Statute mainly regard is the position of the person who was induced to act ; and the principle on which the law and the statute rest is, that it would be most inequitable and unjust to him that if another, by a representation made, or by conduct amounting to a representation, has induced him to act as he would not otherwise have done, the person who made the representation should be allowed to deny or repudiate the effect of his former statement, to the loss and injury of the person who acted on it. If the person who made the statement did so without full knowledge, or under error, sibi imputet. It may, in the result, be unfortunate for him, but it would be unjust, even though he acted under error, to throw the consequences on the person who believed his statement and acted on it as it was intended he should do (215-6). ———In the case of Set on Laing & Co. v. Lafane (19 Q.B.D. 68) Lord Esher said :—" One ground of estoppel is where a man makes a fraudulent misrepresentation and another man acts upon it to his detriment. Another may be where a man makes a false statement negligently, though without fraud, and another person acts upon it. And there may be circumstances under which, where a misrepresentation is made without fraud and without negligence, there may be an estoppel." To this statement it may be added that there may be statements made, which have induced another party to do that from which otherwise he would have abstained, and which cannot properly be characterised as " misrepresentations." ———Specific plea—Necessity—Proof of estoppel without plea - Permissibility—Benamidar—Sale by—Suit by heirs of real owner to recover property subject of—Estoppel by misrepresentations of real owner—Plea of.

A sale-deed in favour of a Hindu lady stated that the price therefor was received from the lady's stridhanum fund through her husband. The lady in her turn sold the property to the defendants, who were bona fide purchasers thereof for valuable consideration. The lady's sons instituted, after the death of their father, a suit for the recovery of the property from the defendants, alleging that the property had been acquired by their father in the name of his wife, that it really belonged to their father and they became entitled to the same by descent on his death, and that their mother had no right to or interest in the same and had none to convey to the defendants. The defendants, in their written statement, alleged that the wife, their vendor, had acquired the property by purchase from out of her stridhanum funds, and that, consequently, it did not pass to the plaintiffs upon the death of their father, but that the wife having purchased the property out of her stridhanum was entitled to sell it. The issue framed on that point was whether the late father of the plaintiffs acquired the disputed property in the name of his wife with his own funds, and remained in possession of the same during his lifetime, or whether the property was acquired by the wife with her own stridhun, and she herself held possession of it.

Held, that the pleadings and the issue were sufficiently wide to entitle the defendants to prove that the father had, during his lifetime, misrepresented that the funds with which the wife had purchased the property were her stridhanum funds and that the property purchased by her was really her property, that he was estopped by his misrepresentations from asserting that he, and not she, was the real owner of that property, and the plaintiffs, claiming by descent from him, were equally estopped from doing so, and that it was not necessary for the defendants to plead the estoppel on the part of the heirs (plaintiffs) arising from the misrepresentation of the father (815-6).

The defendants had purchased under a deed representing that the property had been purchased out of the wife's stridhun. They knew nothing as to the real facts of the case. They allege the facts as they find them represented in the deed which was their title deed. They go to trial upon those facts, and they put in evidence the misrepresentations of the father and the title-deed founded upon those misrepresentations as proof of their case, which was that the property was purchased out of the separate estate of the wife. If the defendants were entitled to avail themselves of the estoppel in consequence of the misrepresentation of the husband, they are entitled to use that estoppel as matter of proof, and they use it to prove that the property was not purchased out of the father's own property, but that it was obtained by the mother, with her own stridhun, and that she herself held possession of it. So they prove the issue on their part by means of the estoppel (815-6). LUCHMUN CHUNDER GEER GOSSAIN v. KALI CHURN SINGH.

———Consent decree or order—Estoppel by—Order of Court not made by consent—Effect of—Distinction.

For purposes of estoppel an order by consent, not discharged by mutual agreement, and remaining unreduced, is as effective as an order of the Court made otherwise than by consent and not discharged on appeal. In other words, the only difference in this respect between an order made by consent and one not so made is that the first stands unless and until it is discharged by mutual agreement or is set aside by an order of the Court; the second stands unless and until it is discharged on appeal. The suit property was let by the plaintiff to the defendant. He was let into possession by the plaintiff's gardener, on her behalf and by her direction, and he regularly paid rent to her and applied to her to do all the necessary repairs. He did not give up possession to her although he duly received notice to quit, and he has, in the suit brought by her for possession of the property, denied her title. He is clearly estopped from denying the plaintiff's title (207).

S. 116 of the Evidence Act is perfectly clear on the point and rests on the principle well established by many English cases, that a tenant who has been let into possession cannot deny his landlord's title, however defective it may be, so long as he has not openly restored possession by surrender to his landlord (207). An Armenian Christian resident in Rangoon made a will by which he appointed his wife executrix and bequeathed to her specified immoveable properties "and all my household furnitures, carriages, horses, chattels and effects, and all money and debts due and owing to me which I shall be possessed of at the time of my death." The testator died in 1897. At that time he was possessed of other immoveable property besides that mentioned in the will, namely, certain land at Kokine in a suburb of Rangoon. The widow obtained probate of the will and administered the estate, sold the three houses in Halpin Road specified in the will, paid all the debts including a mortgage on the Kokine land, and was left finally with that land free from incumbrances and Rs. 19,000 in August, 1904. The family then moved to the Kokine land and resided there from that time and down to the date of the suit which was instituted in 1920. In 1918 the widow conveyed the property to the plaintiff-respondent in discharge of an equitable mortgage with which she had charged it, and he agreed to let it to the eldest son for a year. In 1920 the plaintiff instituted the suit in ejectment out of which the appeal arose against the widow, the eldest son, and the younger children.

Held, that the eldest son was estopped under S. 116 of the Evidence Act from denying the title of the plaintiff, his landlord, but that the younger children were not so estopped (287-8).

It was, indeed, suggested that the younger children also came under S. 116, because they were in occupation under the leave and licence either of the plaintiff or of his tenant, the eldest son. But their Lordships do not take this view of the facts (288). (Lord Phillimore.) VERTANNES v. ROBINSON. (1927) 54 I. A. 276 = 5 R. 427 = 102 I.C. 639 (2) = 29 Bom. L. ——S. 145—Depositions in former case — Documents concerning witness—Use of, to discredit him—Procedure in case of.

On general principles it would appear to be sound that if a witness is under cross-examination on oath he should be given the opportunity, if documents are to be used against him, to tender his explanation and to clear up the particular point of ambiguity or dispute. This is a general, salutary, and intelligible rule, and where a witness's reputation and character are at stake the duty of enforcing this rule would appear to be singularly clear. S. 145 of the Evidence Act is to the same effect. Their Lordships have observed with regret and with surprise that the general principle and the specific statutory provisions have not been followed. The verdict of the High Court is an inferential verdict actually of perjury. The premises upon which this inference proceeds consist, in no inconsiderable degree, of documents, statements, even turns of expression, which are used to confound the spoken word. The safeguards set up by the law with respect to the use of documents have not been observed. Not only have documents been used for the purpose of contradicting witnesses without obeying the injunctions prescribed by law, but the inference thus derived, and improperly derived, from these documents has resulted in an inferential verdict of perjury (147-8). In June, 1910, N executed a sale-deed conveying his share in the joint family property to

S for the sum of Rs. 1,500. The sale-deed recited, inter alia, "About a year ago I came to Poona and asked my uncles and my step-brothers to effect a partition and to allot to me my one-ninth share of our ancestral property. But they refused to give (my) share."

On a question arising as to whether the recitals in the said sale-deed were or were not admissible against the defendants (the other members of the family) on the issue whether N demanded a share of the property in 1909, held, that the sale-deed was some evidence of the act alleged to have been done in pursuance of N's interview with B, and that it was material on the question whether the evidence of N and his witnesses on that part of the case could be relied upon.

It may be that this particular statement (the recital in the deed set out above) does not come within S. 157 of the Evidence Act on the ground that it was not made at or about the time of N's alleged interview with B in 1909. The question was whether the appellant whilst employed as an advocate for the prosecution in an abduction case suggested or hinted to the prosecutor that he should bribe an expert witness to give evidence which would be favourable to him (the prosecutor).

The senior advocate in the abduction case deposed to the effect that, as they were going to Court on a particular day, the appellant said something to him which conveyed to his mind the impression that the appellant had advised the prosecutor to bribe the expert witness. The senior advocate was corroborated by certain persons, who severally stated that he had on the same day repeated to them his impression of the effect of his conversation with the appellant.

For purposes of S. 159 of the Evidence Act, it is not necessary that the writing used to refresh the memory of a witness should have been admitted in evidence. Accordingly, a document not produced in Court within the proper time, and, in consequence, rejected as evidence under the provisions of O. 13, R. 2 of C. P. C. of 1908, may nevertheless be referred to by the party producing it or his witness to refresh his memory if the document is otherwise within the purview of S. 159 of the Evidence Act. "The weight of the evidence, the objection to the document upon the ground that its not having been produced at the proper time renders its authenticity the subject of suspicion, and all other grounds upon which a document can be successfully impeached still remain open, but refusal to permit a man to refresh his memory by proper relevant contemporaneous documents might lead to a grave injustice." EXCHANGE.

———Agreement for—Completed or not—Thing to be exchanged, defined and specified—Thing to be taken in exchange indefinite and requiring further act to be done—Effect.

The case is one of an agreement to exchange, where on the one side the thing to be exchanged is already defined and specified, and where that which is to be taken in exchange is to some extent indefinite and requires a further act to ascertain it. Suppose A and B had agreed to make an exchange of this sort; A agrees to give B six cows, specific cows, in exchange for six horses which he is at liberty to select out of the stock then upon B's farm, the selection to be made at a future time; that is a perfect agreement for the exchange, and all that remains is that A should select the horses on B's farm. There might be a dispute whether the horses that were upon the farm at the time of the agreement had not been removed, and others substituted; they might differ as to the horses which were intended to be taken in exchange; but that would not affect the agreement, but would be a question of the mode of performance of it (142-3). ———Decree in favour of widow as legal representative of deceased plaintiff—Application for execution by his alleged posthumous son—Legitimacy of son—Decision by executing Court as to—Jurisdiction—Not res judicata in regular suit—C.P.C. of 1859, S. 208—C. P. C. of 1861, S. 11—Effect.

Pending an appeal to the High Court the plaintiff died, and his widow was substituted on the record under S. 103 of C. P. C. of 1859, for the purpose of prosecuting the appeal, and a decree was passed in her favour. An appeal was preferred from that judgment to Her Majesty in Council and the judgment was reversed. In the meantime, however, pending the appeal, certain execution proceedings were taken. The widow applied for execution on behalf of herself, and also, in a different character, as guardian of W, an infant, who, she alleged, was a posthumous legitimate son of her deceased husband. The legitimacy of W was disputed by the judgment-debtor, but the High Court, on appeal in the execution proceeding, held that W was the legitimate son of the deceased plaintiff and declared the widow's right to execute the decree in two capacities, partly for herself, and partly as guardian of W.

Upon that, the judgment-debtor having died, his widow instituted the suit out of which the appeal arose for the purpose of setting aside the judgment of the High Court in the execution proceeding upon the ground that in an execution proceeding it was not competent to the Court to entertain such a question as the legitimacy of W. The widow of the deceased plaintiff in the prior suit (W's mother) contended, on the other hand, that the suit was not maintainable, because the very question had been decided between the same parties in a previous suit by a competent Court. In other words, she pleaded res judicata.

Held, affirming the High Court, that the issue as to the legitimacy of W was not res judicata by a competent Court in a competent proceeding (75).

Assuming that W acquired on his birth an interest in the decree that had been obtained by his mother, the decree was not in the terms of S. 208 of C. P. C. of 1859, transferred to him, either by assignment, which is not pretended, or by operation of law, from the original decree-holder. No incident had occurred, on which the law could operate, to transfer any estate from his mother to him. There had been no death ; there had been no devolution ; there had been no succession. His mother retained what right she had ; that right was not transferred to him ; if he had a right, it was derived from his father ; he is not therefore a transferee of a decree within the terms of that section (73-4).

Section 11 of C.P.C. of 1861 cannot apply to the present case, because W was in no proper sense of the word a party to the suit by his alleged father. No rights of W were determined or considered in the suit. He was not on the record when judgment was given, nor when the decree was made (75). (*Sir Robert P. On a question arising as to whether the order striking off the application was to be read as giving permission to the decree-holder to apply afresh, the Subordinate Judge, who made the order in question, construed it, in combination with the statement then made by the decree-holder's pleader, and held that the order ought to be read as giving permission to apply afresh. The High Court considered themselves bound by the order in question as recorded, and were of opinion that liberty was not granted thereby.

On an application for the execution of a decree an order for attachment was made by the Subordinate Judge on the 8th of October, 1874, after notice served on the judgment-debtor to show cause why the decree should not be executed against him. In pursuance of the attachment a sale proclamation was issued. On the 25th of January, 1875, the judgment-debtor presented a petition, by which he prayed that the sale under the attachment might be stayed for three months, and the execution case struck off for the present, with the attachment remaining in force. Upon that petition being presented, the creditor agreed to have the execution stayed in accordance with the petition " the attachment on the property attached continuing." The proceedings under the petition of the 8th of October, 1874, were, however, struck off on the 9th of February, 1875, on account of the decree-holders not paying the cost of issuing the notification.

Held that, as the sale was stayed on the 25th of January, 1875, for three months upon the application of the judgment-debtor, and upon the condition that the attachment should remain in force, the striking off of the case from the Judge's file on the 9th of February, 1875, did not affect the rights of the decree-holders (134-5). Arrest of Judgment-debtor in—(Contd.)

In execution of a bailable writ, a Sheriff's officer peaceably obtained entrance by the outer door, but before he could make an actual arrest, was forcibly expelled from the house, and the outer door fastened against him. The officer obtained assistance, broke open the outer door, and made the arrest. There was no evidence of an express demand for leave to re-enter before the outer door was broken.

Held, that there was no infraction of the law, and no objection could be made to the regularity of the arrest (172).

There is no doubt that a man's house being his castle, the ordinary rule is, that the outer door cannot be broken open to execute civil process; but it is admitted here, that if the prosecutor had been arrested, and had then expelled the defendants from his house, they might have broken open the outer door to enter and re-take him; and their Lordships think that as they had once been lawfully in the house, and he knew that they were lawfully about to arrest him, and he unlawfully caused them to be expelled for the purpose of preventing them from so doing, he cannot be permitted to take advantage of his own wrong, by thus defeating the process of the law; and that they had a right to place themselves in the position which they occupied when his unlawful act began. Without an actual arrest, there was no rescue or escape; but the proposition that till an actual arrest had taken place, the prosecutor might forcibly expel the officer and those acting in his aid, and lock the outer door, so as to entitle himself to the protection of his castle, cannot be supported. The outer door being open, they were entitled to enter the house under civil process; and they being lawfully in the house, to arrest him, he was guilty of a trespass by expelling them. The act of locking the outer door was unlawful, and he could confer no privilege upon himself by that unlawful act (171). (Lord Campbell.) AGA KURBOOLIE MAHOMED v. THE QUEEN. (1843) 3 M. I. Generally speaking, before an outer door can be broken open, even to execute criminal process, there must be a demand of entry, and a refusal. But to what extent? To inform the owners of the house of the purpose for which the entry is to be made, and to afford him the opportunity of opening the door and personally admitting the parties who are to execute the process of the law. This ceremony the law requires, however, to be observed only when it possibly may be attended with some advantage, and may render the breaking open of the outer door unnecessary (171-2). Still the sheriff may consent to do it.

Where, at the request of the plaintiff, the sheriff changes the place of detention of the judgment-debtor, and the latter escapes by reason of the carelessness of the sheriff's officers, and the plaintiff brings an action against the sheriff for escape, it will be, under all the circumstances, for a jury to consider whether, being in some measure instrumental in the matter of the escape, the plaintiff ought to recover against the sheriff at all; and it will be a question of fact to be decided under all the circumstances of the case (487). If the sheriff, upon the representation that the defendant was suffering very severely in health, had taken upon himself to make a relaxation of the imprisonment, and had permitted the defendant, accompanied by ever so many of his own officers, to go and reside in a house of his own, it would have been an escape. There can be no question at all about it; and why? Because the sheriff having taken a party in execution under a capias ad satisfaciendum, is bound to keep him in his own gaol, he cannot of his own authority allow the prisoner to make a gaol for himself; he is bound to keep him in arcta et salva custodia, in order to enforce payment of the debt, and if he relax that arctam custodiam at all, so far the pressure to compel the payment of the debt is relaxed also, which the sheriff has no right to do (481-2). Arrest of Judgment-debtor in—(Contd.)

Supposing that the defendant was in a bad state of health and supposing that it had arisen from his confinement in the prison, and that he had applied to the Supreme Court at Bombay, from which the execution issued, for a rule of court, to be allowed to be taken from the prison and put into some other place, and there kept by the sheriff's officer, and that for the sake of saving his life, or for the benefit of his health, the court had thought fit to grant that indulgence even against the will of the plaintiffs and there had been a rule of court to that effect, and he had been removed out of gaol under that rule of court, and had been kept in the charge of a sheriff's officer in a private house, can there be the slightest doubt that he would then still have been in the custody of the sheriff? I cannot conceive that there would have been any question upon it (482-3). (Sir John Patteson.) HAINES v. EAST INDIA COMPANY.

———Sheriff's custody—Discharge from—What amounts to—Change of place of imprisonment pursuant to private arrangement between plaintiff and judgment-debtor—Effect—Plea of discharge by judgment-debtor in such a case—Maintainability—Estoppel.

Upon the representation of the medical officer that the defendant was in a bad state of health, arising from his confinement in the prison, the plaintiffs (East India Company) wrote a letter to the sheriff that, in consequence of the state of the defendant's health, a temporary release from confinement in the gaol itself was essentially necessary, and that "Government is pleased to permit him temporarily to reside outside the gaol, under such surveillance as may prove as little irksome as possible to the prisoner, while consistent with its perfect efficiency." Their letter to the Superintendent of Police recited that same thing; that the defendant had been allowed to be so under surveillance, and directed him also to take care that he did not go out of the Island. That was communicated to the defendant, who verbally agreed to it, and expressed his willingness to avail himself of that permission. He also actually wrote a letter to the sheriff feeling grateful for the change allowed.

Held, that the defendant continued to be in the custody of the sheriff and that he was estopped from contending that he was not in the sheriff's custody (483-4).

Can there be a doubt but that the object of the plaintiffs was, in consequence of the state of his health, a kindness towards the defendant? Their object was to keep the judgment and the writ of capias ad satisfaciendum still on foot, and to keep the defendant in the actual custody of the sheriff. A place where his health might be re-established, was constituted a special prison for that purpose, by consent as it were. The defendant agrees to that, and is thankful for it. Then, surely, he must be estopped (it is a sort of estoppel) from saying that the custody in which he then was, was not the custody of the sheriff, when both parties intended it to be so, and that in point of law such custody should be treated as the custody of the sheriff (484). The suit property was attached in execution of a decree obtained against A, who died subsequent to the decree. A's wife, who was brought on record as one of his representatives preferred a claim to the attached property, alleging that it belonged to her in her own right. The District Judge made an order allowing the claim and releasing the property from attachment. On appeal, however, the High Court remanded the case to the District Judge for the trial of a material issue, which had not been tried by him. The High Court did not, however, set aside the order of the Judge releasing the property from attachment, because, whether that should be done depended upon his finding on the issue which had not been tried by him.

When the case went back to the District Judge, the decree-holders and A's widow entered into a compromise, whereby the liability under the compromise was substituted for that under the decree in execution. The compromise, however, provided that the attachment already effected on the property should continue. In accordance with the compromise the District Judge struck the execution case off the file.

Held, that the attachment was put an end to by the original order of the District Judge releasing the property from attachment and was never afterwards revived (137-8).

The order of the District Judge striking the case off the list of pending suits could not have the effect of reversing the order releasing the property from attachment. The case being before the High Court on appeal, the District Judge had no power to reverse his order. The compromise did not operate to revive or restore the attachment and make it effective on the mortgage. The liability incurred under the compromise was different from that under the decree, and the effect of the compromise was to substitute that liability for the liability under the decree, and to put an end to the attachment (137-8). Upon an application for execution of a decree, praying that an attachment and sale of the judgment-debtor's property specified in the application should be had for the purpose of satisfying the decree, a question arose as to whether the Statute of Limitations was a bar to that application. EXECUTION OF DECREE—(Contd.)

Bales of jute belonging to the respondent were attached by the appellants pending a suit brought by the appellants against certain third parties, The respondent preferred a claim, under S 278 of the C.P. Code of 1882, to the goods attached, but it was disallowed after inquiry. The goods themselves were subsequently sold in execution, when owing to the intermediate fall in the market, the price obtained for them was only about half of what they were worth at the date of the attachment. The respondent then instituted a suit for damages for wrongful attachment of the goods, and claimed to be entitled to recover their value upon the day of the attachment. The appellants contended that they were not to be held responsible for delay occasioned by litigation, and that the respondent could not recover the difference between the value of the goods upon the day of the attachment and the depreciated price arising from such delay, unless he alleged and proved that the appellants had litigated maliciously and without probable cause.

Held, that, in order to entitle the respondent to recover full indemnity for the wrongful attachment of his goods, he was not bound to allege and prove that the appellants resisted his application maliciously, and without probable cause (27).

The rule contended for for the appellants is one which obtains between the parties to a suit when the defendant suffers loss through its institution and dependence. It does not apply to proceedings taken by the injured party, after the wrong is done, in order to obtain redress. But, in this case, there has been no action and no proceeding instituted by the appellants against the respondent. The summary proceeding under S. 278 was taken by the respondent for the purpose of getting release of an attachment issued in a suit to which he was not a party (27). ———Wrongful attachment—Damages for—Measure of.

Pending a suit, to which the respondent was not a party, brought against third parties, certain bales of jute of the respondent were attached by the appellants, the plaintiffs in that suit, on 28—11—1883. The respondent preferred a claim to the goods attached under S. 278 of C. P. Code of 1882, but that was disallowed after inquiry on 15—4—1884. The goods were sold in execution in June or July, 1884, when, owing to the intermediate fall in the market, the price obtained for them was about half of what they were worth at the date of the attachment.

In a suit instituted on 28—4—1884 by the respondent for establishment of the right which he claimed in the goods, and for damages in respect of their wrongful attachment, the question was whether the respondent was entitled to recover the value of the goods upon the day of the attachment, or only the price which the goods realised when sold in June or July, 1884.

Held, that the illegal attachment of the goods on 28—11—1883 being the direct act of the appellants. for which they became immediately responsible in law, and the litigation and delay, and consequent depreciation of the jute, being the natural and necessary consequences of their unlawful act, the liability which the appellants incurred had been rightly estimated at the value of the goods upon the day of the attachment (27-8).

The appellants relied upon Walker v. Olding, 1 H. & C. 621, as an authority for the proposition that a judgment creditor is not responsible for the consequences of a sale, under a judicial order, of goods illegally taken in execution in satisfaction of his debt. Walker v. Olding would have been an authority of importance had the law of execution been the same in India as in England, but there is in that respect no analogy between the two systems. ———Wrongful attachment—Sale pursuant to — Decree-holder's responsibility for—English and Indian systems—Distinction.

With regard to a judgment-creditor's responsibility for the consequences of a sale, under a judicial order, of goods illegally taken in execution in satisfaction of his debt, there is no analogy between the laws of execution in England and in India. In England, the execution of a decree for money is intrusted to the sheriff, an officer who is bound to use his own discretion, and is directly responsible to those interested for the illegal seizure of goods which do not belong to the judgment-debtor. In India, warrants for attachment in security are issued on the ex parte application of the creditor, who is bound to specify the property which he desires to attach, and its estimated value. Any illegal attachment made in execution is thus the direct act of the judgment-creditor, for which he becomes immediately responsible in law (27). ———Checking of—Court's duty.

Their Lordships cannot pass from this case without the expression of their surprise and deep regret, that such a case should have been possible under the system of jurisprudence prevailing in any country under the British dominion. The subject-matter of the original suit a debt, it should seem undisputed, or at least as to which, in substance, no serious dispute was possible, where the plaintiff's difficulty had not been to establish his right to the judgment of the Court in which he sued, but to make that judgment available when obtained, though the funds were ample for the purpose. By fraud and chicanery, by every possible abuse of the forms and procedure of law, by force and violence, even, it is to be greatly feared, to the shedding of blood, justice was evaded and defied for fifteen years, from 1830, when the decree was pronounced, to 1845, when the final sale took place. The original plaintiff, wearied out with the long delay and expense, fain to sell the benefit of his decree; the unhappy man who had been substituted for him losing his life, while vainly striving to realize its fruits. And now, in 1862, their Lordships have been called upon to dispose of a suit, in which it is sought to invalidate the whole proceeding as against a purchaser for value, the second in succession from the execution creditor against whom, or the party from whom he immediately purchased, no fraud, no collusion, no knowledge of the supposed defects in the title has been alleged. On appeal preferred against the said orders, it was contended by the appellants that the proceedings subsequent to the remand were ineffective, because the appellant's father was, on the precise date of the order of remand, adjudicated an insolvent, and the Insolvent Court, through its officer or the Receiver—was not served and had no opportunity of being present and raising his points in objection to the attachment at the re-hearing on remand.

Their Lordships dismissed the appeal adding a declaration that, if the adjudication of the insolvency of the appellant's father had not been annulled or the insolvency had not otherwise terminated on or before the date of the order made on re-hearing after remand, that order would, owing to the absence of the Receiver or other representative of the Insolvency Court, be inoperative except in so far as it decided against any asserted interests of the appellants, his sons and heirs. After the attachment of property in execution of a decree, the judgment-debtor was adjudicated an insolvent, and an order was made vesting his property in the Official Assignee under the Indian Insolvency Act, 1848. The judgment-creditors obtained an order for the issue of, and served the Official Assignee with, a notice calling upon him to show cause why he should not be substituted in the suit for the judgment-debtor. The Official Assignee was not served with the notice required by S. 248 of C.P. Code of 1882 (the code then in force), nor was he made a party to the proceedings under S. 32 or S. 372 of that code. On the expiry of the time fixed by the notice for cause, the decree-holders, without further notice to the Official Assignee, applied for and obtained, an order not only substituting him as a party in the place of the judgment-debtor but directing the sale of the right and interest of the judgment-debtor in the attached property. At the sale the decree-holder himself purchased the property after obtaining leave to bid. On a question arising between the decree-holder-purchaser and the representative in interest of the Official Assignee as to the validity of the sale in favour of the former, held that the same was altogether irregular and inoperative, because (1) the property having passed to the Official Assignee, it was wrong to allow the sale to proceed at all, (2) no proper steps had been taken to bring the Official Assignee before the Court and obtain an order binding upon him, and accordingly he was not bound by anything which was done, and(3) the judgment-debtor had at the time of the sale no right, title or interest which could be sold or vested in a purchaser (256-7).

A notice under S. 248 of C. P. Code of 1882 is necessary in order that the Court should obtain jurisdiction to sell property by way of execution as against the legal representative of a deceased judgment-debtor (257). (Lord Parker.) RAGHUNATH DAS v. SUNDAR DAS KHETRI.

EXECUTION OF DECREE—(Contd.)

Jurisdiction—Mortgage.

———Decree for sale of Sub-Court in one suit—Supplemental decree of District Court in another suit substituting other properties for those mortgaged—Amendment of former by latter—Jurisdiction to execute supplemental decree.

On 8-1-1877, the Sub-Court of B passed a mortgage decree under which the property comprised in the mortgage was to be sold. Before the sale was effected, it appeared that the property included in the mortgage had by a previous arrangement passed to other members of the mortgagor's family, and that in lieu of it the mortgagors had received other properties which were not included in the mortgage. The mortgagees instituted another suit, also in the Sub-Court of B, for the purpose of bringing within the influence of the mortgage the substituted property. That suit was called up by the District Judge into his Court, and in it a decree was made by the consent of the mortgagors on 6-8-1879. It declared that the substituted properties were fit to be sold in execution of the decree of 8-1-1877 and that for the purpose of that auction sale the subsequent suit ought to be taken as supplemental to the former suit. Then it directed that the mortgage in question, and the decree of 8-1-1877, should be amended according to the aforesaid declaration. Another term of the decree of 6-8-1879 was that the mortgagors were to have six months from the said date for payment of the amount due.

No payment having been made within the said six months, the District Judge, on the application of the mortgagees for execution of the decree of 6—8—1879, ordered a sale of the properties, and they were sold accordingly. It was contended that the decree of 6—8—1879 was really that of the Sub-Judge, and that the District Judge had no power to order execution thereof.

Held, that, on the broad construction of the decree of 6—8—1879, it must be taken to be the decree of the District Judge, that it affected the whole property mortgaged, and that he had jurisdiction to order execution (11).

Even construing the language of the decree of 6—8—1879 strictly, the better construction is that it was intended to be the decree of the District Judge. In point of procedure it was more proper to make it the decree of the District Judge than the decree of the Sub-Judge. If therefore it was desired that the Sub-Judge should execute the decree, there should have been an order made by the District Judge ordering the Sub-Judge to carry the decree into execution. The District Judge carried his own decree into execution, and the decree, which he carried into execution, drew up into itself the decree of the court below, and that it was in effect a decree for a sale of the whole of the property which the new suit approved to be the property affected by the mortgage (11). ———Plea by judgment-debtor of— Maintainability—Estoppel—Attachment in execution after notice to judgment-debtor—Sale pursuant to—Stay of, at his instance and with consent of decree-holder.

On an application for execution, an order for attachment was made by the executing court on the 8th of October, 1874, after notice served on the judgment-debtor to show cause why the decree should not be executed against him. In pursuance of the attachment a sale proclamation was issued. The judgment-debtor not only did not appeal against the order for the attachment, but he presented a petition, by which he prayed that the sale under the attachment might be stayed for three months, and the execution case struck off for the present, with the attachment remaining in force. Upon that petition being presented, the creditor agreed to have the execution stayed in accordance with the petition "the attachment on the property attached continuing".

Held that, in the face of the order of the 8th of October, 1874, and the subsequent proceedings, it was not open to the judgment-debtor to contend that the decree was barred on the 8th of October, 1874 (132). Where in execution of a simple money decree, an application was made for the attachment and sale of property decribed in the Schedule as a 6 annas share in certain property mortgaged to A B, and the said property was sold by public auction, held that the Court had no power to grant a sale certificate which stated that the property sold and purchased was a 6 annas share not included in the mortgage of A B i.e., another and different property from that which was, in fact, sold and purchased; that documents in other judicial proceedings tending to show that a mistake had been made in drawing up the Schedule and that the property intended to be inserted therein was the unincumbered 6 annas were irrelevant, it being impossible to attribute to the public to whom the attached property was offered in sale a knowledge of proceedings in other suits which might have led them to suspect that an error had been made; and that the fact that an advertisement in the Calcutta Gazette, though purporting to be a description of the attached property, differed from the description in the Schedule representing that the property to be sold was free from the mortgage was not a sufficient ground for holding that the property sold was what was described in the Gazette and not in the Schedule though it might be an irregularity requiring the assistance of the Court to cure if the sale were regular in other respects. The description of the northern boundary given in a sale certificate was susceptible of being applied to two kinds of lands, and the question was which of the two kinds was to be taken as the true northern boundary. The description of the northern boundary was "the lands of R". That description meant strictly sole (separate) not ijmali lands. As an imperfect description, it might be applied. The holding sold was found to extend beyond the ijmali lands to the sole owned lands. Held that, as the whole surplus was inadequate to supply the whole quantity purchased, there was no ground for narrowing the construction (201). Fraud in obtaining—Auction purchaser—Fraud of—Evidence of.

———Judgment-debtor's pleader's misrepresentation if.

Appellant was the purchaser of the properties of C at a sale held in execution of a decree obtained against him (C) by T. The respondent was another creditor of C who had also obtained a decree against C and had taken out execution. He (the respondent) sued the appellant, C, and T for a declaration that the purchase by the appellant was invalid on the ground that it was brought about by the fraud of the defendants, that the decree obtained by T was false and was obtained by collusion with C; that there was similar fraud in relation to the attachment and the sale proclamation, and that the appellant was merely a benamidar for C. These charges of fraud were found against, and all that remained of respondent's case was that of fraud and misrepresentation by the judgment-debtor's pleader that he was going to apply for an adjournment of the sale and the consequent omission of the respondent to be present and bid at the sale.

Held, that there was no fraud, and that, even if the alleged misrepresentation of the judgment-debtor's pleader was true, the auction-purchaser was not responsible for the same. Legal representative.

———Death of judgment-debtor pending execution proceedings and after partial execution of decree — Wrong legal representative of his—Execution continued against—Sale in —Validity of.

On the death of N, after the execution in part against him of a decree obtained against him and W, an application for execution was filed giving the name of the person against whom the execution was sought as "the estate of the deceased N," and the names of the parties as, first, N, deceased, by his heir, R, and, secondly, W. The application prayed for the sale of the immoveable property of N for the realization of the balance of the decree amount. Notices were served on R and W. R was the nephew of N, but was not his heir. N's real heirs were his two daughters. R contended that he was not the heir of N, but the Court overruled his objection, decided that he was the right person, proceeded with the execution, and sold N's property.

Held, that the sale was not a nullity but was only irregular, and was binding on the real heirs of N, unless and until set aside in due course of law.

A decree had been made, and partially executed against N, and his estate was liable to make good the balance. To enforce that liability was within the jurisdiction of the Court. It was also within its jurisdiction to receive an application for execution against the legal representative of N. If there had been a dispute who was the heir of N, or whether his property had or had not devolved upon the heir, it was for the Court to determine such matters for the purpose of the execution. That jurisdiction was not lost by reason of the fact that the Court erroneously decided that R was the right person and so proceeded with the execution. Acting in its duty to make the estate of N available for the payment of his debt, the Court served with notice a person who did not legally represent the estate, and on objection decided that he did represent it. To treat such an error as destroying the jurisdiction of the Court is calculated to introduce great confusion into the administration of the law (224-5). (Lord Hobhouse.) MALKARJUN v. NARAHARI.

The Indian Courts have properly exercised a wide discretion in allowing the estate of a deceased debtor to be represented by one member of the family, and in refusing to disturb judicial sales on the mere ground that some members of the family, who were minors, were not made parties to the proceedings, if it appears that there was a debt justly due from the deceased, and no prejudice is shown to the absent minors. But there are usually cases where the person named as defendant is de facto, manager of a Hindu family property, or has the assets out of which the decree is to be satisfied under his control (33). Lunatic—Manager of estate of—Decree held by—Sale in execution of—Purchase by Manager himself at—Validity, ———Security for sale proceeds required from him as condition precedent to actual delivery of possession — Failure to furnish—Effect

M, the Manager of the estate of her husband—a Lunatic—(of which the appellant was at the time of the appeal Manager) obtained a decree in execution of which certain lands belonging to the judgment-debtor were sold and purchased by M. The executing Court required M. to give security for the proceeds of the sale before it would allow actual possession to be given to her. Several months elapsed before she found security, and meanwhile the defendants obtained attachment and sale of the same lands under a judgment obtained by them against the same debtor ; and the lands were sold in execution of their decree, and purchased by themselves, and possession afterwards given to them. M. then brought the suit out of which the appeal arose against the defendants-respondents, asserting her title under the first judgment sale. The Zillah Judge held that M having failed to give security, the sale to her became null.

Held, that that ground was clearly untenable (536).

The security was ordered for the protection of the lunatic plaintiff against misappropriation by his manager. It was not a proceeding affecting the judgment-debtor, and was entirely collateral to the course of the suit between the judgment-creditor and judgment-debtor. The omission to give this security could not in any way affect the title which had vested in the plaintiff by the previous sale. This decision of the Zillah Judge had the effect of causing the omission by the Lunatic's manager to do an act intended to secure the fruits of his judgment to him, to operate so as to deprive him altogether of them, and hand them over to the second judgment-creditor It is much to be lamented that such a misconception should have taken place (536). Mortgage.

———Decree on foot of—Earlier decree superseded by later one to same effect—Execution Petition and attachment under earlier decree—Sale pursuant to, after date of later decree—Validity—Prejudice—Absence of.

A decree for sale was passed on 15—4—1886 against a Hindu father and his two minor sons, notwithstanding the objection of the father that he was not their guardian, and that a guardian ad litem had not been appointed for the minors. The decree directed the recovery of the suit amount from the father personally and by sale of the mortgaged property. That decree was, however, set aside against the minors on 28—9—1886 on the application of their maternal uncle. A fresh decree was passed on 15—11—1886, which, though it superseded the decree of 15—4—1886, was to the same effect as that decree.

On 16—8—1886 the mortgagee applied for execution of the decree of 15—4—1886 by attachment and sale of the mortgaged property. In that application the court caused on 24—1—1887 a proclamation of the intended sale, and in pursuance thereof the right, title and interest of all the defendants in the mortgaged property was sold and was purchased by the mortgagee himself. The certificate of sale showed that the right, title, and interest in the property of all the defendants to the suit were sold to the mortgagee.

Held, that the sale was and was known to all the parties to be, in execution of the decree of 15—11—1886, though the application for execution was of the decree of 15—4—1886, and the attachment was made under that decree (59). gagors and the sons of S and K, each having left one son. Pending the suit a petition was put in praying that the points in issue in the suit should be referred for final disposal to the arbitration of a named person. The petition was not signed by the sons of S and K, and appended to it was a postscript signed by the remaining parties praying that the names of the sons of S and K might be struck off from the suit. An order for reference was then made, the arbitrator made an award, a decree was passed in accordance with the award and in execution thereof the mortgaged property was sold. On a question arising whether the shares of the sons of S and K in the mortgaged property passed by the sale, held that they did not (36).

The sons of S and K never signed the agreement for reference, and the Court was asked to strike their names out of the record. They were not, therefore, parties to any of the subsequent proceedings which were founded exclusively on the agreement, and it is immaterial whether their names were actually removed from the record or not (36). ———Decree on foot of—Sale in execution of—Legal representatives of a deceased mortgagor-defendant—Omission to implead one of, in suit—Estate of deceased if bound by sale.

In a suit to enforce a mortgage a petition was presented to the Court praying that the points in issue between the parties should be referred for final disposal to the arbitration of a named person. N, one of the mortgagors and a defendant to the suit, signed the agreement of reference, and died shortly after. On his death his two widows and his minor son by his mother, one of the widows, were named as his legal representatives on the record. N had also an infant daughter, but her name was omitted. The evidence showed that the widows and the son of N were served with summonses to appear; that they were prepared to accept the award of the arbitrator; and that they were also served with notice of the sale of N's estate held in execution of the decree passed in accordance with the award of the arbitrator making the said estate liable.

On a question arising whether, in face of the omission to implead the daugther of N, his estate could be held to have been sufficiently represented for the purpose of the suit, and his equity of redemption in the estate could be held to be bound by the sale in execution, their Lordships answered the question in the affirmative (34). N executed a mortgage and then died. A suit to enforce the mortgage was thereafter brought. The suit was instituted against A described as a "minor aged about 14 years, legal representative of N, deceased, by his guardian, his uncle B." A was, of course, one of the heirs of N, but in no other sense his legal representative. And B was not in any legal sense or in fact the guardian of A, and was never appointed his guardian ad litem.

Pending the suit, the points at issue therein were referred to arbitration, the petition being signed by B as "guardian of A", amongst others. An award was made by the arbitrator, a decree was passed in accordance with the award, and in execution thereof the estate of N was sold.

EXECUTION SALE—(Contd.)

Mortgage—(Contd.)

On a question arising as to whether N's heirs were bound by the proceedings in the suit, and his share of the property, whatever it was, effectively sold in the suit, or at any rate the share of A himself passed by the sale, held that the estate of N was not represented in law or in fact in the suit, and the sale of his property was therefore without jurisdiction and null and void (36).

Held also that the share of A himself in his father's estate was not bound (36).

In support of the validity and binding character of the proceedings and the sale, reliance was placed on the judgment of this Board in Malkarjun v. Narahari, 27 I.A. 216. Their Lordships think that the observations in that case do not apply to the case now before them. In the prior suit the judge seems to have accepted without question the statement on the record that A was legal representative of N, and B was his guardian and never applied his mind to the matter. Doubtless he would have done so if the suit had proceeded in the ordinary course, but the proceedings in the suit were cut short by the agreement for reference. It was not, therefore, the case of an erroneous decision, ruling, or exercise of discretion of the judge in a matter in which the court had jurisdiction (35-6).

The share of A himself in his father's estate was not bound. In the opinion of their Lordships it is not a mere question of form, but one of substance (36). ———Property subject to—Sale of—Mortgage turning out to be invalid—Benefit of—Party entitled to.

On the sale of property subject to encumbrances the vendor gets the price of his interest, whatever it may be, whether the price be settled by private bargain or determined by public competition, together with an indemnity against the incumbrances affecting the land. The contract of indemity may be expressed or implied. If the purchaser covenants with the vendor to pay the incumbrances, it is still nothing more than a contract of indemnity. The purchaser takes the property subject to the burthen attached to it. If the incumbrances turn out to be invalid the vendor has nothing to complain of. He has got what he bargained for. His indemnity is complete. He cannot pick up the burthen of which the land is relieved and seize it as his own property. The notion that after the completion of the purchase, the purchaser is in some way a trustee for the vendor of the amount by which the existence, or supposed existence, of encumbrances has led to a diminution of the price, and liable, therefore, to account to the vendor for anything that remains of that amount after the incumbrances are satisfied or disposed of, is without foundation. After the purchase is completed, the vendor has no claim to participate in any benefit which the purchaser may derive from his purchase.

After the completion of the sale, the prior mortgages were declared invalid, and the question arose as to which party was entitled to the benefit accruing to the property from its having been exonerated from mortgage liability, the mortgagee-purchaser, or the mortgagor. Held. that the mortgagee decree-holder puchaser was entitled to that benefit, and that he was not accountable to the mortgagor for the amount thereof as unpaid purchase money or by reason of his being estopped from denying the validity of the mortgages. In sales under the direction of the Court it is incumbent on the court to be scrupulous in the extreme and very careful to see that no taint or touch of fraud or deceit or misrepresentation is found in the conduct of its ministers. The Court, it is said, must at any rate not fall below the standard of honesty which it exacts from those on whom it has to pass judgment. ———Purchasers at—Rights of—Distinction.

However nice the distinction between the rights of a purchaser under a voluntary conveyance and those of a purchaser under an execution sale may be, it is clear that a distinction may, and in some cases does, exist between them. It is sufficient to instance the seizure and sale of a share in a trading partnership at the suit of a separate creditor of one of the partners. The partner could not himself have sold his share so as to introduce a stranger into the firm without the consent of his co-partners, but the purchaser at the execution sale acquires the interest sold, with the right to have the partnership accounts taken in order to ascertain and realise its value (255). ———There is a great distinction between a private sale in satisfaction of a decree and a sale in execution of a decree. In the former the price is fixed by the vendor and purchaser alone ; in the latter the sale must be made by public auction conducted by a public officer, of which notice must be given as directed by the Act, and at which the public are entitled to bid. Under the former the purchaser derives title through the vendor, and cannot acquire a better title than that of the vendor. Under the latter the purchaser, notwithstanding he acquires merely the right, title and interest of the judgment-debtor, acquires that title by operation of law adversely to the judgment-debtor, and freed from all alienations or incumbrances effected by him subsequently to the attachment of the property sold in execution (75). EXECUTION SALE—(Contd.)

Three brothers, C, G and S, were in joint possession of certain mouzahs on a jaghire tenure under Rajah N, the predecessor in title of the appellant. The Rajah N, obtained three decrees for rent, two against C alone, and the third against the three brothers. A sale in execution took place at which the decree-holder himself purchased the mouzahs. It appeared from the order confirming the sale that it was made in all the three execution cases, after separate attachments effected in the several cases, and the publication of separate sale proclamations. Before the granting of the certificate, the three brothers filed objections, which were, however, disallowed, for the purpose of having the sale set aside, and these proceedings showed that the three brothers understood that the sale was in all three decrees, and that they were all judgment-debtors, and the property had been sold in execution of at least one judgment against them all.

In a suit by S for a declaration that the sale was held in execution of one of the decrees to which he was not a party, and was therefore void against him, the High Court held that, having deliberately elected to execute the decrees against C alone, and, having, after the sale, chosen to have the sale treated as made in execution of one of the decrees to which S was not a party, the decree-holder and the appellant were estopped from treating the sale as made in execution of the decree against all the brothers.

Held that, the question was not one of estoppel, but of fact, and the evidence in the case clearly showed that the sale was held in execution of all three decrees, and therefore the entire property passed by it.

Held further that, as the truth appeared on the face of the proceedings, and the brothers were not deceived as to the facts, or prevented by any misstatement of the Rajah from asserting any rights they might have conceived themselves to possess, there could be no estoppel either. In or about 1848 the representatives of R obtained a decree against the widows of the adopted sons of B, as the then representatives of B, in respect of a money demand against B. In execution of that decree, the representatives of R bought, on 16—7—1850, among other things, the right, title and interest of the judgment-debtors in a decree of 11—11—1843. That was a decree obtained by the adopted sons of B against R. It declared the title of the said adopted sons to the moiety to which B was entitled in an eight anna share in a talook called N, which had been purchased in the name of R but which was claimed by B to be joint family property. The decree of 11—11—1843 also awarded possession of that moiety to the adopted sons of B.

In the year 1837 the whole of talook N was attached by an order of the Civil Court, and remained in the possession of an officer of the Collector until the year 1866. But, notwithstanding that, the Court, upon the representatives of B obtaining their decree in November, 1843, attempted to give the decree-holders, at all events, constructive possession of a certain number of the mouzahs, included in the moiety decreed to them, and for that purpose deputed an Ameen to ascertain what belonged to them. The Ameen marked out by sticks and posts certain lands which, according to his view, the decree-holders were entitled to, and he gave them or professed to give them possession of those lands, and he also required the ryots to sign kabuliyats with respect to those lands. Those proceedings were approved by the Court. It was undoubted, therefore, that the Court intended to deliver possession as far as it could, and believed that it had the right to deliver possession effectual for the execution of the decree to the decree-holders of a certain number of mouzahs. The question was whether the representatives of R, buying on 16—7—1850, bought with it those mouzahs with respect to which it had been executed in the manner described, or only so much of the property to which it related with respect to which it remained unexecuted?

Held, affirming the Courts below, that what was put up for sale, what was intended and what was understood to be sold, must have been the unexecuted portion only of the decree. GRISH CHUNDER CHUCKERBUTTY v. JIBANESWARI DEBIA. (1880) 6 C. 243 = 3 Suth. 776 = 7 C. L. R. 420.

Their Lordships consider that the Zillah Judge was in error in granting the order for the second sale under the respondent's attachment, and confirming the purchase by him, when the sale of the same lands had already taken place under M's attachment, and the purchase by her under that sale had been confirmed and had not been set aside. This course was not in accordance with the Code of Procedure. Such a course also is in any case clearly contrary to the interests of debtors as well as creditors, as it is obvious that when property is offered at a second sale, with the cloud cast on the title by the subsisting first sale, it would be likely to go for an inadequate price (536-7). To hold that a purchaser at a sale in execution is bound to inquire into such matters would throw a great impediment in the way of purchases under executions. The general rule of the law of England governing all sales by private contract between the parties either of a free-hold or of a lease-hold interest in land is: "If the conveyance has been actually executed by all the necessary parties, and the purchaser is evicted by a title to which the covenants do not extend, he cannot recover the purchase-money either at law or in equity" (125).

The chief reasons for the rule are that the purchaser by private contract has full means of investigating the title of the vendor, and of either satisfying himself that it is good, or of protecting himself against any apparent or latent defect in it by proper and apt covenants. If he fails to do either, his subsequent eviction is the result of his own negligence. This rule does not govern a case in which the sale, as regards the owner of the thing sold, is in invitum, and made under colour of legal process. The purchaser at a sheriff's sale has at best very inadequate means of investigating the title of the judgment-debtor; all that is sold and bought is the right title, and interest of the judgment-debtor with all its defects; and the sheriff who sells, and executes the bill of sale, is never called upon, and if called upon, would refuse, to execute any covenant of title. Therefore, the reasons for the rule failing, the rule itself cannot properly be held applicable to sales by the sheriff, which are governed by rules peculiar to such sales (125). (Sir James W. Colvile.) DORAB ALLY KHAN v. ABDOOL AZEEZ.

———Eviction from property purchased—Recovry of purchase-money from judgment-creditor in case of—Suit for—Cause of action—Defences open—Sale held void for want of jurisdiction—Purchaser in possession for sometime—Eviction by judgment-debtor afterwards.

The suit was by the executor of D, for the recovery from the defendant of a sum of money had and received by the defendant for the use of D. The Courts below dismissed the suit on the ground that the plaint disclosed no cause of action, legal or equitable, as against the defendant. And the only question before their Lordships was whether the courts below were right in so holding.

The plaintiff's allegations were: That D was the purchaser at a sale by the sheriff under a writ of fi fa of certain property for the sum of Rs. 26,000; that the sale was held to be null and void on the ground that the sheriff had no authority to execute the writ at the place where the property was situate; that D was in consequence evicted by the judgment-debtor; that the sheriff did so execute the writ under the authority, and by the express direction of the judgment-creditor; and that D was therefore entitled to recover from the defendant, the execution creditor, the amount of the purchase-money which was paid by D (the amount sought to be recovered in suit), and which sum had been received by the defendant from the sheriff.

Held, reversing the courts below, that the action could not be properly determined without further investigation into the facts, as it could not be said that the plaintiff's allegations did not disclose a prima facie case for some relief against the defendant (128).

There is, no doubt, a further question whether the plaintiff has shewn a case which, if proved, would entitle him to recover back the purchase-money as money had and received to his use as upon a total failure of consideration. To that the admitted fact of the possession by his testator for nearly two years of the property in question, and his perception, partial at least, of the rents and profits, might be a fatal objection. It could not, in such a case, be said that the consideration wholly failed. But it is not quite clear on the record that this objection arises since if the sale has been treated as a nullity, the purchaser has been accountable, and may have accounted, for what he received; and in any case the court in India will be competent to mould the relief according to the facts finally established at the hearing. Their Lordships offer no opinion whether the plaintiff will ultimately succeed in establishing his right to any relief. It may turn out that his testator, who never made any claim for a return of the purchase-money in his lifetime, brought with knowledge of the defect in the sheriff's jurisdiction, or has, by acquiescence or in some other way, forfeited any right which he might otherwise have had to relief. They only decide that the plaintiff has not wholly failed to disclose a good cause of action on the face of the record; and that the cause ought to be tried on the other issues that have been, or may be, raised in it (128-9). ———Eviction from property purchased by judgment-debtor—Refund of purchase-money on—Decree-holder's liability for—Law applicable.

In a suit by the purchaser, at a sale by the sheriff under a writ of fi fa, upon being evicted by the execution debtor, to recover the purchase-money which he had paid from the execution creditor, on the ground that the sheriff had no authority to execute the writ at the place where the property was situate, and that he did so execute it under the authority, and by the express direction of the judgment creditor, the High Court assumed that if the defendant was to be treated as a principal in the transaction the case must be governed by the ordinary rules relating to vendors and purchasers upon voluntary sales of immoveable property. Their Lordships, while agreeing that the defendant was to be treated as a principal in the transaction, held, that the rule as to voluntary sales did not apply (128).

The defendant directed the sheriff to sell in his character of sheriff. He did not profess to sell, nor could he have sold, as for himself. He intended the sale should be, as in fact it was, a sale by the sheriff as sheriff, and with the incidents attaching to such a sale (128). (Sir James W. Colvile.) DORAB ALLY KHAN v. ABDOOL AZEEZ.

———Eviction from property purchased under title paramount—Remedy in case of, against sheriff and judgment-creditor—Sheriff acting within jurisdiction—Sheriff acting ultra vires—Distinction.

When the property has peen soid by the sheriff under a regular execution, and the purchaser is afterwards evicted under a title paramount to that of the judgment-debtor, he has no remedy against either the sheriff or the judgment-creditor. This, however, is because the sheriff is authorised by the writ to seize the property of the execution debtor which lies within his territorial jurisdiction, and to pass the debtor's title to it without warranting that title to be good (126).

The sheriff, however, if he acts ultra vires, cannot invoke the protection which the law gives to him when acting within his jurisdiction. He is in the position of an ordinary person who has sold that which he had no title to sell. And his responsibility in respect of the sale must be governed by the law relating to the sale of chattels, rather than by that relating to the sale of real estate (126).

The sheriff may reasonably be held to undertake by his conduct that he has seized and put up for sale the property sold in the exercise of his jurisdiction; although when he has jurisdiction he does not in any way warrant that the judgment-debtor had a good title to it, or guarantee that the purchaser shall not be turned out of possession by some person other than the judgment-debtor (127-8). ———Purchase-money paid by — Recovery of, from judgment-debtor — Suit for — Maintainability—Revenue sale—Surplus proceeds of—Execution purchase of, with notice of suit to set aside sale—Sale subsequently set aside.

The respondents purchased in execution of a money-decree obtained by a third party against A, the surplus proceeds of a sale of A's estate for arrears of revenue under Bengal Act XI of 1859. The surplus proceeds in the hands of the Collector so purchased by the respondents amounted to a sum of Rs. 35,000, and the price paid by the respondents for their purchase was only a sum of Rs. 8,000. The sum of Rs. 8,000 paid by them was applied in satisfaction of A's debts.

The revenue sale was subsequently set aside in a suit which had been instituted by A prior to the date of the sale at which the respondents purchased; and the respondents had notice of that suit at least before the sale to them was confirmed. After their purchase, the respondents applied to the Collector for the payment out of them of the surplus sale proceeds in his hands, but he refused to do so on the ground that the sale had been set aside.

In a suit subsequently brought by the respondents against A for the recovery of the purchase-money, Rs. 8,000, which had been paid by them, and which had been applied in satisfaction of his debts, held that they had no cause of action for the recovery of the money from A (142).

The respondents' purchase was subject to the contingency of A succeeding in his suit to set aside the revenue sale. There was no warranty or contract on the part of A. The sale was had under proceedings in invitum, and indeed against his express protest. The respondents bought the chance of getting Rs. 35,000 for Rs. 8,000 dependent on the happening or non-happening of a certain event. They have therefore no equity in their favour (142). B, the holder of an impartible estate the succession to which was regulated by the custom of primogeniture, was a member of a joint Hindu family governed by the Mitakshara law. In execution of a money decree obtained against B, his "right, title and interest" in 12 villages of the zemindari were attached and sold and purchased by the appellant in 1876. According to the then accepted law the holder of an impartible zemindari who was himself a member of an undivided family, could not alienate or encumber the corpus of the estate so as to bind his co-parceners, except for justifiable especial causes. In 1889 this interpretation of the law was reversed by the Judicial Committee which decided that impartible estates are not inalienable in the absence of proof of some special family custom or tenure attaching to the zemindari, and having that effect. B died without male issue, and his brother, the respondent, succeeded to the zemindari by survivorship. The appellant instituted a suit in 1893 against the respondent for the recovery of the 12 villages on the ground that he (the appellant) had by his purchase acquired an absolute interest in them.

Held, agreeing with the Courts below, that in 1876, when the sale took place, the parties must be taken to be bound by the law as it was at that time understood, and that the estate purchased by the appellant was only the life interest of B, the then zemindar.

The reversal of the previously accepted interpretation of the law does not displace its application to the construction of the contract contained in the certificate of sale now under consideration. (Sir Andrew Scoble.) ABDUL AZIZ KHAN v. APPAYASAMI NAICKER.

Each case in which the question is raised as to what interest passed to the purchaser of a debtor's right, title and interest in property must depend upon its own circumstances, and "in all the cases, at least the recent cases, the inquiry has been what the parties contracted about if there was a conveyance, or what the purchaser had reason to think he was buying if there was no conveyance, but only a sale in execution of a money decree." In the case of a sale in execution of a money decree, the questions are, what did the Court intend to sell, and what did the purchaser understand that he bought? The lady cannot be allowed to say that the original attachment ceased to be operative so as to give her the power of acquiring the mortgage interest subject to which she has purchased, and yet to claim the benefit of it, in order to defeat conveyances which would unquestionably have been binding between the judgment-debtors, from whom she took her mortgage, and the respondents in this case, if there had been an end of the execution altogether (877). Subsequently, the respondents paid to the appellant the sum found due to him by the decree, and possession of the property was restored to them. Then the respondents applied in execution proceedings for mesne profits with interest. The appellant contended that a separate suit was necessary.

The suit by the respondent was for setting aside a decree and auction sale, on finding them to be illegal, fraudulent and collusive. The plaint alleged that the defendants-appellants procured a person represented by the minor appellants to institute a groundless suit for monies which were not due ; that, in order to get the respondent out of the way, they, by a collusive suit, got him declared a lunatic and by threats forced him to leave his home and stay elsewhere in secrecy ; that they concealed the money suit, got a false return of service, and carried through the decree and sale of the respondent's properties behind his back.

Held, that the dismissal of applications by the respondent under Ss. 108 and 311 of C.P.C. of 1882 to have the decree and sale set aside was no bar to the maintainability of the suit.

The allegations in the plaint are plainly an attack, not on the regularity or sufficiency of the service or the proceedings, but on the whole suit as a fraud from beginning to end. Ss. 108 and 311 of C.P.C. of 1882 limit the attention of the tribunal to specific matters, and, instead of subjecting to enquiry the radical question now involved, they assume the existence of a real suit. But here the suit itself is attacked as a fraud ; and the fraudulent and violent incidents of its progress, as, for instance, at the stage of service and in the abduction of the respondent, while they may individually have founded an application under Ss. 108 and 311, are here treated as parts and indicia of a whole. A's estate was sold for arrears of revenue under Bengal Act XI of 1859, and, after deducting the arrears of Government revenue and sale expenses, a certain sum remained as surplus proceeds in deposit in the hands of the Collector. That sum was purchased by the respondents in execution of a money decree obtained against A by one B, and the purchase-money paid by the respondents was applied in satisfaction of the decree of B and of other decrees obtained by other persons against A. The revenue sale was, however, subsequently set aside in a suit brought by A for that purpose, and, in consequence, the Collector refused to pay the respondents the amount purchased by them.

Quære whether, assuming that the respondents had recovered from B and the other execution creditors the purchase-money paid by the respondents on the ground that their purchase had become infructuous, the right of the execution creditors would not have been revived against A (143).

———Rights of parties on—Restoration of property sold to judgment-debtor—Condition of—Deposit paid into Court by auction purchaser to complete sale—Amount paid by him to discharge debt charged on property—His right to refund of—Distinction—C. P. C. of 1908, S. 144—Effect.

B, the predecessor in title of the appellants 1-5 (the judgment-debtors), was the owner of a full sixteen annas share of a village. Ten of the said shares were encumbered and six were unencumbered, save that two bonds had been executed by B in favour of one G, which purported to create a charge on a three annas share in the said mahal as security for the said G for two sums of money.

In execution of a decree obtained against B, some of the respondents (auction-purchasers) purchased the six unencumbered annas share, and a sale certificate was granted to them, which declared their respective interest in the six annas share, and also declared that such share was subject to the charge created by the afore-mentioned bonds, but was outside the ten annas share hereinbefore described as the encumbered property. The purchase-money was paid into Court and eventually distributed to various mortgagee decree-holders and others holding money decrees against the judgment-debtor whose debts were thereby discharged to the extent of such payments. The auction purchasers were duly put into possession of the six annas share purchased by them and paid off the amounts covered by the two bonds in favour of G.

The auction sale was however set aside by the Privy Council on appeal. Thereupon the judgment-debtors applied claiming restoration to them of the said six annas share of the property together with mesne profits. The auction-purchasers resisted the said claim, and contended that they could not be asked to restore the property until (a) the amount which they had deposited in Court to complete the sale; and (b) the sum paid by them to satisfy the bonds given by B in favour of G had been refunded.

Held that, the auction purchasers were entitled to re-payment of the deposit paid into court as a condition precedent to their handing over possession to the judgment-debtors (355-6); but that the payments made by them to clear off the bonds in favour of G could not be made a condition of restoration to the judgment-debtors (356).

The auction-purchasers have parted with their purchase-money which they paid into court on the faith of the order of confirmation and certificate of sale already referred to. This money has been distributed amongst creditors of the judgment-debtor who had attached the unencumbered property in question and could have realised their judgment-debts by a sale of this property in execution and it would be inequitable and contrary to justice that the judgment-debtor should be restored to this property without making good to the auction-purchaser the moneys which have been applied for his benefit. It is the duty of the Court, both under S. 144 of Civil Procedure Code of 1908 and in the exercise of its inherent power to place the parties in the position which they would have occupied, but for such decree or such part thereof as has been varied or reversed. The remedy of the auction purchasers was not merely to apply for a certificate of sale of the unencumbered property or to obtain from the judgment-creditors re-payment of the sums paid out to them under the orders of the Court (355-6).

As regards the sums paid by the auction-purchasers to G, this payment stands on a different footing from the deposit of the purchase-money. It was an optional payment, made without any order of the Court, and as it entitled them to ———Suit by judgment-debtor for, based on fraud of decree-holder—Maintainability.

The decree-holder and the judgment-debtor mutually agreed to postpone the execution sale for two months and the judgment-debtor prepared a petition counter-signed by the pleader for the decree-holder acting under his instructions, praying for the postponement of the sale but presented it to the wrong court. The executing court, not having any petition for postponement on its file, proceeded with the sale in the absence of the judgment-debtor and his advisers who left the court under the belief that the sale was postponed. The decree-holder was present, allowed the sale to proceed, himself became the purchaser, and was put in possession. In a suit filed by the judgment debtor for setting aside the sale, held, affirming the judgment of the court below, that it would be breach of faith on the part of the decree-holder to retain the advantage of his purchase, and that the sale ought to be set aside.

———Suit by some of judgment-debtors for, based on fraud of other judgment-debtors, decree-holder and auction-purchaser.

The respondent obtained a decree for possession of some lands and for mesne profits and costs against the appellants and certain other persons who were co-sharers with them in Futtehpore. In execution of that decree Futtehpore was attached. Thereupon, appellants and two others paid their quota of the judgment-debt and came to an arrangement with the decree-holder that their shares should be exempted from sale. The shares of the other co-sharers were alone put up for sale, and were sold. That sale was afterwards set aside and the attachment revived, and a fresh sale took place at which the whole of Futtehpore was sold.

The appellants and the other persons interested thereupon instituted the suit out of which the appeal arose for setting aside the second sale, alleging the above facts and that the setting aside of the first sale, the revival of the attachment, and the second sale were brought about by fraud and collusion in the part of the other co-sharers, the judgment-creditor, and the auction-purchasers, who were all made defendants. The plaint was in effect based on the footing that the judgment-creditor broke his alleged agreement with the plaintiffs, and that the other persons alleged to have been implicated, being aware of the circumstances, took some part in the transaction.

Both the courts below held that the question which the plaint sought to raise could only have been determined by the order of the Court which executed the decree, and that in such a case a separate suit for the purpose of setting aside an execution sale was expressly forbidden by S. 244 of C. P. C. of 1882.

In an administration account directed against an executor, held, that errors in the dates assigned in the "Schedule" to the answer, and in the "discharge," to certain payments alleged to have been made by the executor on account of the estate for debts due, did not preclude the executor from proving, if he could, that those payments had been made at other dates than those stated in the schedule and discharge.

Though the inaccuracy of the statement as to dates might affect the costs, those who are interested in the estate are not entitled to say that, because a payment was not made at the date assigned to it, therefore it ought to be taken as not made at all. Administration of estate by—Legatee's right to question—Estoppel.

———Minority of legatee—Distribution made during—Minor acting upon, after attaining age—Re-distribution made impossible by him—Effect.

By his will a testator directed that his business should be carried on for 16 years after his death and that there should then be a distribution, and he gave to the appellant's grandfather a share of the residue. The appellant became entitled to the share of the residue in right of her grandfather.

The estate of the testator was not wound up at the end of 16 years. The appellant executed a power of attorney in favour of her husband authorizing him, inter alia, to represent her in all matters connected with the estate of the testator and to execute deeds in her name. At the instance of appellant's husband, the estate was divided into portions, a portion was allotted as and for the share to which the appellant was entitled under the will, and her husband executed a release to the executors.

In a suit instituted by the appellant years after for the administration of the estate of the testator, she alleged that she was under age when she executed the power of attorney, and that she was therefore not bound by it or by the release executed on her behalf under it.

Held that, assuming that the appellant was an infant when she executed the power of attorney, she had failed to show sufficient ground for re-opening the division already effected.

In their Lordships' opinion the appellant had, after coming of age, adopted the division of the property which was in fact made, and made by independent arbitrators. She had valuable property allotted to her under it, which she sold at a profit sometime after she came of age, and it was only when the greater part of what she had received had been dissipated that she complained. She has been acting throughout with her husband and has not complained of his acts. It is impossible now for the appellant to restore the property she has received, and a general re-distribution Adverse title to property disposed of by will.

Appellant, the only son of a deceased Hindu, was one of the executors and trustees named in his will and sole residuary legatee. He joined in obtaining probate. He took upon himself the management of the estate and possessed himself of all the assets. For some years he acted in execution of the trusts of the will. Called upon to account and charged with various breaches of trusts he asserted that the will was wholly inoperative and that the entire estate was joint family property, and that it belonged to him in his individual capacity by right of survivorship.

Held, to such a contention advanced under such circumstances it would be a sufficient answer to say that no person who has accepted the position of trustee and has acquired property in that capacity can be permitted to assert an adverse title on his own behalf until he has obtained a proper discharge from the trust with which he has clothed himself. The will of a Mahomedan testator was in the following terms:—"In respect of taluqa G, the following conditions will be observed: My four grandsons will be the owners and possessors of the taluqa in equal shares after me and will manage it in union. The sanad of the taluqa shall be in the name of my eldest grandson. After him in the name of every eldest in order of succession and the same order will continue in the family. After deducting the lambardari dues and proper and necessary expenses (which will be incurred in consultation of the four grandsons) the total profits and other entire incomes of mal and servai will be divided equally. If the other grandsons make a request to the holder of the sanad for the partition, then it will be incumbent on him to divide (the property) in equal shares in spite of the sanad." After a devise of the village D, the incumbrance on which was to be discharged by the said grandsons, to the testator's daughter, the will proceeded in paragraph 3 as follows:—"Besides the property specified and detailed above, my four grandsons will be owners, in equal shares, of the property which is mine or which I may or will acquire." Then followed provisions for various expenses to be borne in future, and the will concluded in paragraph 9 as follows:—"The burden of the whole debt which may be found due from me after my death will be upon my entire property, moveable and immoveable, excepting the village D, and my four grandsons will be responsible for the liquidation."

The testator did not expressly appoint any executors of his will or guardians of his minor grandchildren. It was argued that an express appointment was not necessary if the testator had clearly shewn by his will an intention to entrust the administration to particular individuals, but on a fair construction of this will no such intention can be gathered from it. He left his property to his grandsons so that each share thereof vested at once in the devisee, subject to the obligations attaching thereto, and there appears to be no necessity for any act of an executor to complete the operation of the will. No doubt the testator contemplated a partition by the grandsons themselves of the property devised to them, and in that case it would be necessary for his grandson, if still an infant, to have a guardian, but there is nothing whatever to show that he intended all or any one of the brothers to act in that capacity. So far as his intention is concerned, it may well have been that if, and when, the necessity for a guardian arose, the selection should be made by the court (54). The plaintiffs took out an administration summons against M, as one of the executors of their father, for administration of the assets of the estate of their father. In the affidavit, and also in the petition which was filed in order to obtain that summons, the plaintiffs alleged that M had, as such executor, relinquished their one-fifth share in a decree for Rs. 1,70,000, by executing a deed of assignment of the said share for Rs. 5,000 only, and thereby caused a loss to the plaintiffs of the balance of Rs. 23,333. An order was made on that petition referring the matter to the Master and

In a suit subsequently instituted by the plaintiffs to set aside the assignment of their share in the decree aforesaid, as having been made for an inadequate consideration, upon returning the amount paid by the assignee, held that the administration summons aforesaid was no bar to the maintainability of the suit.

It is a general rule of law and equity than an executor or administrator has an absolute power of disposal over the whole personal effects of his testator or intestate, and that they cannot be followed by creditors into the hands of the alienee. The principle is, that the executor or administrator in many instances must sell in order to perform his duty in paying debts, etc., and no one would deal with an executor or administrator if liable afterwards to be called to account (221). As an executor may absolutely dispose of the testator's assets for the general purposes of the will, there is no reason why, in the exercise of a sound discretion, and presuming the language of the will does not peremptorily require an absolute sale, the executor may not raise the money required by a partial sale or mortgage of the assets (221). ———Validity of—Heir's right to dispute—Estoppel—Conditions.

A widow who had been appointed executrix under the will of her husband, but who had no power to convey the property after 1904, as she had then completely wound up the estate, conveyed the suit property to the plaintiff-respondent in 1918 in discharge of an equitable mortgage with which she had charged it. In a suit in ejectment brought by the plaintiff the defendants, the younger sons of the testator, who claimed to be entitled to the suit property as heirs of their father as upon an intestacy, disputed the validity of the conveyance to the plaintiff. The question was whether they were estopped from doing so.

There was no representation by the younger sons to the plaintiff that the property was wholly their mother's, or that she had the title to dispose of it as executrix. The truth was that all the parties were under a misapprehension that the property was the widow's and it was under that misapprehension that the plaintiff purchased the property.

Held that, under the circumstances, the younger sons were not estopped from disputing the validity of the conveyance (288). (Lord Phillimore.) VERTANNES v. ROBINSON.

But the estate had been wound up by the year 1904, completely wound up, unless it be said that the executrix had not discharged her duty by transferring to the children of the testator their various shares. executed by K, appointing B as his executor, and obtained probate, after which he (B) sued M and D to recover the property of the testator which they succeeded to and possessed themselves of. B's suit was dismissed on the ground that, taking the will and the codicil to be proved, the plaintiff had no right to institute a suit to be let into possession of the unadministered effects of the testator, and that, when the sons were let into possession, there was an end of the right of the executor to interfere, the will providing "in every respect they (testator's sons) are foolish and ignorant, and they throw away all the property, like dust; if they mend their manners it is well, and if you (executor) think proper, you may place them in the shop to carry on the business; but if they do anything improper, they are not to be placed."

Held, affirming the courts below, that the power given to the executor by the will was not a power of control to be exercised by the executor from time to time, according to the conduct of the children; that the right construction of the will was that if the sons showed a disposition to amend, it was for the executor to consider whether they would be let into possession, but that, if they were once let in, the power of the executor was at an end; and that the executor, who might have come to administer the trust immediately after the death of K, having permitted the sons of K to take the actual management, his control was at an end. The will of N, a Hindu, addressed to the respondents, who were his eldest and fourth sons, and whom he constituted his executors, provided as follows:—"You will from my estate perform my obsequies and those of my wife, and constantly perform religious acts in a suitable manner. Whenever you perform any religious, or other acts, you two brothers will inform the other six brothers; and if they acquiesce in your opinions, you eight brothers will perform the act collectively; otherwise, whatever you two brothers think proper, you will do; and should any one raise objections, it is inadmissible."

Held that, on the right construction of the will, it did not authorise the executors to expend whatever sum they liked on the obsequies of the deceased, however ruinous such expenditure might be to those who had the property bequeathed to them (248).

The meaning of the words "otherwise, whatever you two brothers think proper, you will do; and should any one raise objections, it is inadmissible" is this: If you (the six brothers) do not think proper to attend the obsequies of your father you shall not be heard afterwards to find fault with the manner in which the ceremonies were performed, or to raise trifling objections to the expense incurred; but these words do not give the executors an unlimited authority to waste the property of the deceased, and to leave his children destitute (249). By his will, B bequeathed a legacy of a lakh of rupees to M, his grand-daughter and a minor. After B's death, his widow, who was appointed executrix under his will, made certain incomplete gifts to M. Subsequently B's widow laid out Rs. 90,000 in buying a house for M, which was actually bought and in which she resided till she died. The question arose whether that sum of Rs. 90,000 was provided out of the incomplete gifts, or out of the legacy of a lakh, to M, under her grandfather's will, which formed part of his estate in his widow's hands.

Held, that the presumption was strong that B's widow paid for the house out of the legacy, for which she clearly was liable, and not out of inchoate gifts, for which she had not yet made herself liable at all.

The case is the ordinary case of a property not wholly administered, but so far administered that the executors are entitled to a release from the residuary legatee. The proviso is the ordinary proviso which conveyancers, perhaps needlessly, are apt to put into a deed of release of this kind merely for the purpose of showing that the residuary legatee does not release, and does not affect to release, the executors from those trusts which yet remain to be performed (93-4). ———Position and rights of—Probate of will—Grant of, under Probate and Administration Act—Effect.

The title conferred upon every executor who has obtained probate under the Probate and Administration Act is obviously convenient, as tending to facilitate the administration of the estate of the deceased and the adjustment of the rights of all parties concerned connected with it. But in the case of every Mahomedan will it establishes a somewhat peculiar state of things (256).

A Mahomedan testator has not an unlimited power of disposition by will; he can only deal with one-third of his property; the remaining two-thirds pass to his heirs whatever the terms of the will may be. Thus the executor, when he has realized the estate, is a bare trustee for the heirs as to two-thirds, and an active trustee as to one-third for the purposes of the will; and of these trusts one is created by the Act; and the probate irrespective of the will, the other established by the probate. There are thus two trusts for different sets of persons of different properties and based upon different titles. And this state of things does not arise from any accidental conflict of laws such as gave rise to a somewhat similar complication in the case of Concha v. Concha, (1886) 11 A.C. 541, but by the deliberate action of the Legislature. In giving effect to a system of so peculiar a nature as that described their Lordships think it necessary to proceed with great caution. The sons of a deceased Hindu by his first wife were, under his will, executors and residuary legatees of all his property, subject to a legacy to the deceased's second wife and her sons charged upon the property. To secure a debt advanced by the appellant Bank to the said executors and residuary legatees for the purposes of a business started and carried on by them after the testator's death for their own benefit, the said executors and residuary legatees deposited with the appellant Bank by way of equitable mortgage the title-deeds of a portion of the property charged with the legacy. By the terms of the will the legacy was to be made up and paid within 6 years after the testator's death, which period had expired 8 years before the date of the mortgage.

In a suit by the junior wife of the deceased and her sons to establish the priority of their charge over the mortgage to the Bank, the Bank contended that, assuming notice of the will on their part, they were entitled to assume that the executors were acting with the consent of the legatees.

Held that, though lapse of time was a circumstance that might be taken into consideration in such cases, yet, in view of the fact, that two of the sons by the junior wife were still minors when the title deeds were deposited with the Bank, and that continued possession by the executors and residuary legatees was not inconsistent with the purposes of the will, the rights of the parties were unaffected by that circumstance. In a suit by the reversionary heir of one P, the plaintiff pleaded that the maternal grandfather of P agreed to give P a share in his family properties along with his sons, and that the sons had assented to that arrangement.

P had left a will which recited the agreement and the assent pleaded by plaintiff. The executors appointed under the will were members of P's maternal grandfather's family. On the death of P, the executors under his will applied to the Deputy Collector and Deputy Registrar of Grants and Certificates, Madras, for a transfer from P's name of property which had been purchased with the joint funds of the maternal grandfather's family in the name of P, and for the issue of a certificate. In the application it was stated that the property had been acquired by inheritance, the grantee or registered holder being the brother-in-law of the petitioners, and that the registered holder had left a will stating that the petitioners might take a fresh certificate after his death. There was a clause in the will to that effect. The certificates were issued as prayed.

The plaintiff contended that the will had been acted upon by the executors, who were members of the maternal grandfather's family, and that that fact showed that the statement in the will was true.

Held, over-ruling the plea, that, though the conduct of Transfer of estate to Administrator-General by.

———Beneficiary's suit for declaration of invalidity of, and for accounts against executor—Decree in, upholding transfer and dismissing suit—Subsequent suit by beneficiary for accounts of dealings with estate by executor—Maintainability.

The executors nominated by a testator accepted and retained office for two years and a half after his death, when they executed a transfer of the estate and its management to the Administrator-General, bearing to be in pursuance of the provisions of the Administrator-Generals' Act of 1874. The petitioner, the ultimate beneficiary under the will, instituted a suit based wholly on the illegality of the transfer by the executors to the Administrator-General. His plaint prayed (1) for the appointment of a receiver; (2) for an injunction to restrain the Administrator-General from interfering with the estate or its management; (3) for removal of the executors-nominate, and the appointment of new executors or trustees, and a judicial scheme for their administration; (4) for an account of the dealings of the executors-nominate with the estate; and (5) to have the maintenance payable to the petitioner and his mother fixed by the Court.

Their Lordships held the transfer to the Administrator-General to be valid, and dismissed the petitioner's suit. The petitioner contended that the dismissal of his suit might deprive him of his remedy against the executors-nominate in respect of charges of malversation in their office made by him against them, and that the dismissal of the suit might afford the executors-nominate a good defence of res judicata in respect of a new action brought by him against them for an account of their dealings with the estate.

Held, that there was no room for any such apprehension (207).

The conclusions for accounting, which are directed, not against the Administrator-General, but against the executors-nominate who made the transfer to him, are simply ancillary to the leading conclusions of the plaint which precede them. They are aptly framed for the purpose of ascertaining the

Held further, that if the executors-nominate failed to make over to the Administrator-General funds or property which they had no right to retain, it would be open to the person, who had the ultimate beneficial interest in the estate, to call them to account, in order that such funds or property should be paid or transferred to the Administrator-General (207). ———Ss. 1 and 3—Taking case out of former section and bringing it under latter—Findings necessary for

To bring a case within the third, and take it out of the first section, of the Factors' Act, the Court must categorically find the facts of want of good faith, and of notice to the lender of want of authority in the agent, or that he is acting mala fide in the transaction against his principal (161). S. 3 of the Act, though it insists upon a conclusion as to the want of good faith, and of notice to the lender of want of authority in the agent, or that he is acting mala fide in the transaction against his principal, prescribes nothing as to the nature of the evidence on which it is to be founded, or the manner in which the inquiry is to be conducted. The question must be dealt with as any other question of fact, by a due consideration of all the circumstances (165). (Lord Justice Knight Bruce.) GOBIND CHUNDER SEIN v. RYAN. (1861) 9 M. I. In deciding the issue of want of good faith, and notice to the lender that the agent has no authority, or is acting mala fides, the proper question to be considered is whether the circumstances under which the pledge was made were such as that a reasonable man, and a man of business, applying his understanding to them, would certainly know that the agent had no authority to make the pledge, if not also that he was acting mala fide in respect thereof against his principal (160-1). ———Malicious prosecution—Distinction—Test.

One G was convicted of having attempted to obtain official information by bribery. Subsequently, the officiating resident at Hyderabad applied to the District Magistrate at Simla for a warrant to arrest the appellant on the charge of having abetted G in the commission of that offence. The Magistrate granted the application, and issued a warrant for the appellant's arrest. The appellant was arrested in pursuance of the warrant, and was taken to the court of the District Magistrate. He was released on bail, undertaking to appear on a day named at the Court of the District Magistrate. On an application by the appellant to set aside the warrant, the warrant was cancelled, and the proceedings thereon were set aside by an order of Her Majesty in Council.

In a suit brought by the appellant against the Secretary of State for India, alleging that the warrant was issued without jurisdiction and that the charge against him was unfounded, and claiming compensation for the injury inflicted upon him, and the sufferings, expense, and loss which he had sustained in consequence, held, that the case was one of false imprisonment or nothing, and that no question of malicious prosecution was involved (157).

———Wharf—Exit from, conditioned on payment—Exit without payment—Preventing by force of—If and when false imprisonment.

Plaintiff entered a wharf belonging to the defendants and paid a penny to stay there till the boat should start and then be taken by the boat to the other side. The defendants were always ready and willing to carry out their part of this contract. Then the plaintiff changed his mind, and wished to go back. The rules as to the exit from the wharf by the turnstile required a penny for any person who went through. This the plaintiff refused to pay, and he was by force prevented from going through the turnstile. In a suit by him for damages for assault and false imprisonment, it was not suggested that there was any excessive violence at all.

Held, that there was no false imprisonment at all.

The plaintiff was merely called upon to leave the wharf in the way in which he contracted to leave it. There is no law requiring the defendants to make the exit from their premises gratuitous to people who come there upon a definite contract which involves their leaving the wharf by another way. And the defendants were entitled to resist a forcible passage through their turnstile. (Lord Loreburn, L. C.) ROBERTSON v. BALMAIN NEW FERRY CO., LTD.

Held that, on the true construction of the will in question, the words "members of my family" therein, meant the members of the testator's family who were existing at the date of his death, and that there was no reason why the words should be extended to include people other than those existing when the testator died (1030). FAMILY—(Contd.)

The word "family" is elastic and capable of different interpretations.

Where a will, which made a good bequest of the income of a house for religious purposes, provided: "The said house shall remain under the control and the supervision of the shebait for the time being, but shall be available to all the members of my" (testator's) "family both male and female, for temporary residence and use," held that the phrase "members of my family" in the will meant the members of the testator's family who were existing at the date of his death and the bequest was valid.

Their Lordships see no reason why the word "family" in this will should be extended to include people other than those existing when the testator died (1029-30). FATAL ACCIDENT.

———Compensation for—Claims for, by different members of family—Total amount—Fixing of, before considering question of apportionment of same—Necessity.

On a claim for compensation by members of the family of a person killed by accident, under an enactment which corresponded to the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, ordinarily known as Lord Campbell's Act, held that it was advisable to proceed on the principle of assessing the total amount in the first instance, and then to apportion it (318). (Lord Parmoor.) ROYAL TRUST CO. v. CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY CO. (1922) 31 M. L. T. 317 (P.C.).

———Compensation for, to family of person killed—Measure of—Elements to be taken into account.

When a claim for compensation to families of persons killed through negligence is made, the right to recover is restricted to the amount of actual pecuniary benefit which the family might reasonably have expected to enjoy had the deceased not been killed. It is not competent for a Court or a jury to make in addition a compassionate allowance. The principle, as stated by Lord Watson in Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada v. Jennings is applicable in cases where the loss, in respect of which compensation is claimed, is based on the cessation of an income derived from professional skill :—

"It then becomes necessary to consider what, but for the accident which terminated his existence, would have been the reasonable prospects of life, work and remuneration; and also how far these, if realized, would have conduced to the benefit of the individual claiming compensation" (318). ———Compensation for, to family of person killed—Principle of fixing—Application of to particular cases—Difficulty in.

In a case of a claim for compensation to families of persons killed through negligence, the difficulty arises not in the statement of the principle on which the amount of compensation is to be arrived at, but in its application to a case in which the extent of the actual pecuniary loss is largely a matter of estimate, founded on probabilities, of which no accurate forecast is possible (319). FATAL ACCIDENT—(Contd.)

———Damages sustained by relatives in consequence of—Suit for—Right of—Railway Act of Canada, 1919, S. 385.

The question was whether S. 385 of the Railway Act of Canada, 1919, established in respect of acts and omissions to which it applied a new principle of responsibility; new in the sense that independently of provincial legislation it created a liability to pay damages in a civil action for causing the death of a human being and new in the sense that the liability so created extended to consequences which were neither the immediate or the direct result of the act or omission complained of nor within the intention actual or presumed of the Railway Company.

Held, affirming the Courts below, that the operation of the section was subject to the rule of the common law that an action does not lie for damages suffered in consequence of the death of a human being, that the section did not establish any such liability as that contended for; and that the absence of anything specifying the class or classes of persons entitled to indemnity in such circumstances was significant (221-2).

Since Lord Campbell's Act was enacted in 1846, similar legislation has been passed by many legislatures in the United States as well as in British Dominions, and it appears to be the general practice in enacting such statutes to define the class or classes for whose benefit an action may be brought; and the fact that the Railway Act in question is silent upon this matter affords, their Lordships agree, an indication that the section is not addressed to the subject of indemnity for damages arising from death (222). Under the Fatal Accidents Act of Saskatchewan, which correspondens to the Fatal Accidents Act in England, otherwise known as Lord Campbell's Act, the legal personal representative of a person whose death has been caused by the negligence of another is entitled to sue for damages only in cases where the deceased himself, if he had lived, would have been entitled to maintain an action and recover damages (207). ———Professional man—Accident to—Compensation to widow and son of—Amount of—Ascertainment of—Principle.

C, an eye, ear and throat specialist thoroughly competent and reliable in his professional work, was killed in a railway accident on the line of the respondents. He was said to have been one of the best men in his profession at the place. He was in good physical condition at the time of his death. He was 46 years old, and his expectation of life, calculated on an actuarial basis, was, at the time of his death, 23 years.

On a claim for compensation by his widow and his son, held that the duty of the Court was first to estimate as nearly as possible the capitalised value to the widow and child of the share which they would have enjoyed in the future earnings and probable savings of the deceased, and then to deduct from the sum so ascertained the amount received for accident insurance, with proper allowances in respect of the life policies and in respect of the acceleration, by reason of the death, of the benefits coming to the dependents under the will of the deceased (319). ———Person in—Gift obtained by—Validity of—Onus of proof of—Solicitors—Onus in case of.

The relief given by a Court of Equity is a secondary consequence of the principle that a person, standing in a relationship in which authority or influence may be supposed to exist, cannot hold a mere gift without making it clear that the intention to make it was not the result of his influence. The relationship itself does not necessarily preclude the making of the gift ; but the burden lies on the donee to show that there was no such influence as to the source of the gift. The courts have refused to enumerate exhaustively the cases in which the presumption of undue influence will prima facie be made. Religious influence is included, and so are many other classes of influence in which the donee may from his position be presumed to be likely to have exercised special influence over the mind of the donor. But he can discharge the burden incumbent on him by showing that, the relationship notwithstanding, the donor knew completely what he was doing, and acted of his own complete free will. With certain kinds of fiduciary relations, such as that of a solicitor taking a gift from his client, this is obviously, much more difficult to establish than in others where the duty is less definite. Courts of Equity have, therefore, exercised a certain freedom in their decisions as to where and how the principle is to be applied. (Viscount Haldane.) DAING SOHARAH v. CHABAK BINTE.

When any one is in a fiduciary position he cannot sell to himself. Thus an ordinary trustee cannot buy trust property nor can an official appointed to conduct a sale for creditors be himself the purchaser. This rule is, however, inapplicable to a case in which a seller sold not on behalf of the debenture-holder alone but on behalf of the company, and it was his duty and interest to secure as high a price as possible, so that the balance—after meeting secured debts —should go to the company, and such a balance was in fact received. In such a case the fact that the buyer was himself a holder of the debentures became irrelevant. There

The suit out of which the appeal arose was brought by the owner of a talook called K. A., who sought a declaration of his right to and to be restored to possession of a certain quantity of land appertaining to a mouzah named Julkur Khuluk Shajai, part of the talook, his case being that that was a mouzah originally covered with water, and so forming a large bheel or lake ; but that in recent times a portion of the land so covered had become dry and cultivable during, at least, a part of the year. The defendant, who was the owner of a neighbouring talook called Gobindpore, denied the plaintiff's title to the soil of that Julkur Khuluk Shajai, and he made some claim to it himself.

There was no question of the plaintiff's title to talook K. A. The only question was whether the right of the plaintiff in the Julkur Khuluk Shajai was, as the defendant contended, merely a right of fishery in the bheel, or whether it was, as the plaintiff contended, the right to a mouzah covered with water.

Certain butwarra papers were put in as old as 1799, whereby the Julkur in question, which was certainly then called a mouzah, was described as belonging to Pergunnah Bhatia Gopalpore ; but inasmuch as no area was given to it in the description, it was contended that it was treated merely as a fishery right. The original settlement papers of Pergunnah Bhatia Gopalpore were not on the record.

Held, that if it had appeared from the settlement papers of the Pergunnah that all which at the time of the perpetual settlement had been settled for with the then Zemindars of the Pergunnah was a right of fishery, that might afford an inference that the soil of the bheel remained in the Government ; or that, at all events, any land reclaimed therefrom would be subject to a fresh assessment of revenue ; but that that circumstance would give no title to the proprietor of one part of the Pergunnah against the proprietor of another part of it (811). ———Tidal navigable river—Jalkar right of several fishery in—Crown grant prior to permanent settlement of—Proof of.

The plaintiffs claimed, as proprietors of a several fishery in certain tidal navigable waters in Eastern Bengal, a decree for possession of an exclusive fishery in a portion of a river channel, of which the principal defendants owned both the bed and the banks. The river channel in question was broken through the defendants' chur-land in 1897. Though relatively small, it was of considerable size and was navigable for small craft. The plaintiffs claimed the exclusive fishery in that new navigable channel as falling within the upstream and downstream limits of their several fishery. The defendants justified their claim to fish in a portion of that channel as part of the rights of owners of the subjacent soil. The actual grant, if any, under which the plaintiffs claimed the right in question was not forthcoming, but they produced documentary evidence on the strength of which the trial Judge decided that they had próved a Government grant or settlement about the end of the 18th century.

Held that, though the evidence of a Government grant of an exclusive fishery in navigable waters ought to be conclusive and clear, yet, in so far as such evidence could be expectcd to be forthcoming as to particular grants more than a century old, the evidence in the case was sufficient to show that the competent authority—the Government of India in right of the Crown—did actually grant to the plaintiffs' predecessors in title, or settle with them so as in effect to grant, a Jalkar right of several fishery in certain of the waters of the portion of the Ganges system in question (227-8). ———Tidal navigable river in Bengal—Jalkar right in—Grantee from Government of—River forming new channel—Right of grantee to follow river where subjacent soil belongs to a riparian proprietor—English Law—Distinction.

It must now be taken as decided in Bengal that the Government's grantee can follow the shifting river for the enjoyment of his exclusive fishery so long as the waters form part of the river system within the upstream and downstream limits of his grant, whether the Government owns the soil subjacent to such waters as being the long-established bed, or whether the soil is still in a riparian proprietor as being the site of the river's recent encroachment (235).

Their Lordships would in any case be slow to disturb decisions by which rules have been established for Bengal governing extensive and important rights such as rights of Jalkar, and unless they could be shown to be manifestly unjust or flagrantly inexpedient, their Lordships would not supersede them (238).

The common law of England as such does not apply in the mofussil of Bengal. The Indian Courts have, however, in many respects followed the English law of waters. But far as it has gone in the adoption of English rules, there is one step which the Indian law has never taken. Often as the opportunity for so doing has arisen, it has never been held that the capacity of the Government of India to grant to or settle with a private owner the exclusive right of fishing in tidal navigable waters is so indissolubly bound up with its ownership of the soil subjacent to those waters that, no matter how those waters may subsequently change their course, while still remaining part of the same river system within the upstream and downstream limits of the grant, the enjoyment of the right so granted cannot extend beyond the limits of the Government's ownership of the soil lying perpendicularly underneath them, as it may vest from time to time (238, 239-40). In truth the rule which in the United Kingdom connects the right to an exclusive fishery in tidal navigable waters with the limits of the Crown's ownership of the subjacent soil is itself the result of conditions partly historical and partly geographical which have no counter-part in Lower Bengal (241). ———Tidal navigable river in Bengal—Jalkar right in—Grantee's right to "follow the river" if extends to new channel formed not gradually but suddenly and rapidly—English law—Inapplicability of.

It was urged that the established rule with regard to alluvion should be applied to rights of jalkar; that since the right to accretions and the liability to derelictions of soil attached only to gradual accretions or to erosious taking place by imperceptible degrees, so too the right of the owner of the fishery to "follow the river" ought to be limited to cases where the river's encroachments were gradual, and ought not to be extended to an irruption sudden and accomplished rapidly. But here too Indian law, doubtless guided by local physical conditions, has adopted a rule varying somewhat from the rule established in England where under English conditions the rule applies to "imperceptible" alterations. Regulation XI of 1825, Arts. 1 and 4, speak of "gradual accession." The analogy of the English law can hardly be prayed in aid when Indian legislation has thus an established and different rule on the same subject. The Indian rule is established now beyond question (244-5.) (Lord Sumner.) SRINATH ROY v. DINABANDHU SEN.

The appellant was a natural-born subject of the Ameer of Afghanistan, who was duly enlisted and enrolled in 1911 in the 126th Beluchistan Regiment of His Majesty's Indian Forces. He took the oath of allegiance to His Majesty and made a solemn declaration undertaking, among other things, to go wherever ordered by land or sea. On September 4th, 1912, he was a private serving with the detachment of that regiment which was encamped on Shameen or Shameen island at Canton. On Shameen were situated the various European settlements including the British. The appellant was charged with the murder of his Subadar on that date, tried before the Supreme Court of Hongkong and convicted.

On appeal to the Privy Council, the appellant contended that the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court was not established.

The British Vice-Consul who, in September 1912, was also acting consul at Canton, was Judge of a Provincial Court, held at Canton under Article XIX of the China and Corea Order in Council, 1904, which was a Court of Record, and by Article XXII exercised "all His Majesty's jurisdiction, civil and criminal, not under this order vested exclusively in the Supreme Court." He was called as a witness at the appellant's trial and deposed that the place of the murder was entirely within his jurisdiction; that the jurisdiction exercised at Canton on Shameen was the same ex-territorial jurisdiction as was exercised throughout China by the Supreme Court; that it was then in force; that "The Indian Soldiers enjoy His Majesty's protection in Shameen, Canton, and the court exercises jurisdiction over them"; and that "consular protection extends to trying persons and protecting them if they are improperly arrested." The witness went on to say that he conducted the preliminary examination in that case (appellant's) and considered it expedient that the case should be sent for trial to Hongkong, thus satisfying the provisions of Article L of the Order with regard to the transfer of the case from Shameen to Hongkong.

Held, that S. 4 (1) of the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890, did not prevent the witness's evidence from being admissible upon the question and that, in the absence of contradiction and of any grounds for real doubt, his evidence by itself satisfied all the conditions of proof requisite to establish the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court at Hongkong. They are not words limiting other provisions by which a person is clearly brought within the jurisdiction. They mean that when a "foreigner," as such, is to be brought within the jurisdiction, he can be so dealt with only in the cases and according to the provisions specified, but when a person is brought under the jurisdiction as "a British-protected person," and the fact that he is a foreigner is only accidental, the limitation contained in the words "and not otherwise" in Art. Article XXXV (2) of the China and Corea Order in Council, 1904, provides that "subject to the provisions of this order criminal jurisdiction under this order shall, as far as circumstances admit, be exercised on the principles of and in conformity with English law for the time being." In cases in which there are no provisions in the Order material on a point as modifying or excluding the principles and practices of English law, the matter may be justly treated as if English Criminal law and practice applied to the Criminal Jurisdiction of the Supreme Court at Hongkong. Such law and practice are not, however, in all respects and particulars binding on that court, because of the necessary distinction that must, sometimes, be drawn between the criminal procedure of a European country, whose jurisprudence has a defined history extending over many centuries, and that applicable to a British possession in the Far East where a mixed and fluctuating population is subject to the administration of the law by European Judges, whose duty it is to have regard alike to the principles of British justice, and to the necessities of local order. ———Art. 35 (2)—Statement by accused while in custody—Admissibility in evidence.

The appellant was a natural-born subject of the Ameer of Afghanistan, who was duly enlisted and enrolled in 1911 in the 126th Beluchistan Regiment of His Majesty's Indain Forces. He took the oath of allegiance to His Majesty and made a solemn declaration undertaking, among other things to go wherever ordered by land or sea. On September 4th, 1912, he was a private serving with the detachment of that regiment which was encamped on Shameen or Shameen island at Canton. On Shameen were situated the various European settlements including the British. The appellant was charged with the murder of his Subadar on that date, tried before the Supreme Court of Hongkong and convicted.

Some 10 or 15 minutes after the Subadar was shot, Major Barrett, the officer commanding the detachment, who had been summoned from a little distance, arrived at the camp. He found the appellant in custody and in bonds. The Major put certain questions to the appellant, to which the latter replied: "Some three or four days he" (the Subadar who was murdered) "has been abusing me; without a doubt I killed him."

On appeal to the Privy Council the appellant contended that his statement to the Major was inadmissible—(a) as not being a voluntary statement but obtained by pressure of and fear of consequences; and (b) in any case as being the authority and answer of a man in custody to a question put by a person having authority over him as his commanding officer and having custody of him through the subordinates who had made him prisoner. The evidence of the Major, which was uncontradicted, showed that the appellant's statement was not induced either by hope or fear.

Held that, in the circumstances of the case, the trial Judge did not exercise his discretion improperly in admitting the evidence of the appellant's statement.

The words "as far as circumstances admit" in Article XXXV (2) of the China and Corea Order in Council, 1904, may well be applicable to such circumstances in the present case as the facts, that the facilities for formal proof of statutes passed and administrative orders made in various parts of His Majesty's dominions cannot be as copious in Hongkong as they are in this country (England), and further, when, as in the present case, a force detailed for the protection of Europeans resident beyond His Majesty's dominions in the midst of a population, often turbulent and at the particular time disturbed, is itself disturbed by such a crime as the murder of a Subadar by a native private in the ranks, such word may well cover and be designed to cover some necessary departure from the formalities only, as distinguished from the essentials, of English justice. The Forfeiture Act IX of 1859 was passed for the special purpose of providing a Court for the adjudication of claims by innocent persons upon the property of rebels which had been forfeited to the Government. It established a special Court, consisting of three Commissioners, and suspended the action of all other Courts in respect of such claims. Special modes of proceeding are established, and various clauses in the Act relate to that special course of procedure. But there are provisions in the Act which relate not merely to the Court so established and the procedure under it, but are of a general character, and apply to the property forfeited in whatever Court the claims may be made regarding it. One of those clauses is cl. 16. ———Repeal of, by subsequent legislation—Extent of.

It was contended that the Forfeiture Act IX of 1859 was of a temporary nature, and that its provisions fell with the purpose for which it was passed. But the Act is not made temporary by any enactment. It was in part repealed by the general repealing statute of 1868, that is Act VIII of 1868, and the mode of repeal is significant. It is not altogether repealed, for the general clauses of the Act, Ss. 16, 17, 18, and 20, are saved from the operation of the repealing Act. The repeal and saving are both found in the schedule to Act VIII (175). (Sir Montague E. Smith.) MOHUMMUD BAHADOOR KHAN v. THE COLLECTOR OF BAREILLY.

It was urged that this Act (Forfeiture Act IX of 1859) was not retrospective. Undoubtedly counsel was able to suggest cases in which hardships might arise to persons who would not have a full year to claim before they would be barred under the provisions of this Act, or even when the year might have elapsed between the date of the confiscation and the passing of the Act. Although hard cases may arise, their Lordships consider that the Act is plainly retrospective in its operation, and includes claims to forfeited property which had been confiscated previously to its passing. ———S. 20, Proviso—Innocent party aggrieved by forfeiture or seizure—Suit by—Applicability of proviso to.

It was argued that the limitation prescribed by S. 20 of the Forfeiture Act IX of 1859 could be held only to apply to some right, title, and interest—using the words of the ordinary execution Acts—of the rebel himself. It is obvious that this cannot be the right construction of the Act. It would be a wholly insensible enactment if it were, because the Act assumes that the interest of the rebel is forfeited, and it is only in respect of claims other than his that this limitation could operate. The Act is declared not to affect the rights of parties in respect of the property seized. "The property" is the thing seized as forfeited, whether it be land or a jewel, and the right referred to is the right of an innocent party, other than the right of the rebel, in that property (175-6). ———Limitation prescribed by—Exemption in favour of persons under disabilities—Implication by equitable construction of.

It was argued that a saving with respect to parties under disabilities must be taken to be by equitable construction implied in this clause (S. 20 of Forfeiture Act IX of 1859). It is impossible that any Court can add to the statute that which the Legislature has not done. The limitation is enacted in plain and absolute terms. The Legislature has not thought fit to extend the period which it has prescribed to persons under disability. Where such enlargements have been intended, they are found in the Acts containing the limitation, as in the general Act (XIV of ———Limitation prescribed by—Limitation Act of 1859—Provisions of, relating to disabilities—Importation into S. 20 of Act IX of 1859.

FORFEITURE ACT (IX OF 1859)—(Contd.)

It was said that the clauses in the general statute, the Limitation Act of 1859, relating to disabilities might be imported into this Act (Forfeiture Act IX of 1859), but this cannot properly be done. Act XIV of 1859 is a Code of limitation of general application. This Act is of a special kind and does not admit of those enactments being annexed to it (176). (*Sir Montague E. ———Nature of—Substantive enactment and not mere proviso.

It is true that this limitation (the limitation prescribed by S. 20 of the Forfeiture Act IX of 1859) is introduced by way of proviso. But their Lordships think that, looking at the various parts of the Act and gathering the purpose and intention of the Legislature from the whole, this was a substantive enactment; and that, although it appears under the form of a proviso, it was a limitation intended by the Legislature to apply to all suits bronght by any persons in respect of forfeited property (175). ———Suit in Civil Court in respect of forfeited property—Applicability of proviso to.

It was suggested that this limitation (the limitation prescribed by the Proviso to S. 20 of the Forfeiture Act of 1859) was meant to apply only to claims prosecuted before the Court of Commissioners established by the Act, and it was contended that the Act was of a temporary nature, and that its provisions fell with the purpose for which it was passed, But the Act is not made temporary by any enactment. It was in part repealed by the general repealing statute of 1868, that is Act VIII of 1868, and the mode of repeal is significant. It is not altogether repealed, for the general clauses of the Act, Ss. 16, 17, 18 and 20, are saved from the operation of the repealing Act. The repeal and saving are both found in the Schedule to Act VIII. It is clear from their being thus saved that these clauses were at that time considered by the Legislature to be of a general nature, affecting claims to property which had been forfeited before whatever Court those claims might be prosecuted (175). Before and at the time of his death of T, however, one B was in the actual possession of the property. B became a rebel, and in May, 1858, his property was seized by the Government as forfeited on the ground of his rebellion, At the time of their father's death, and of the forfeiture of the property, the appellants were minors. The elder appellant became ot age in 1861, and the younger in February, 1864. The suit was brought on the 1st of May, 1865, and at that time the elder appellant had been of age for 4 years, and the younger appellant for upwards of a year.

The Government relied upon the proviso to S. 20 of the Forfeiture Act IX of 1859, and the question was whether it applied to the case, and barred the suit.

Fraud vitiates the most solemn proceedings of courts of justice. Though therefore a Government sale for arrears of revenue gives a title against all the world, yet a fraudulent purchase at such sale by a mortgagee will not defeat the equity of redemption. The principle embodying this distinction pervades the law. Under sales in market overt, the purchaser acquired a good title against all the world; but this protection did not extend to a fraudulent buyer who knew that the seller had no real authority to sell. If the thief who sold in market overt purchased the article, the defrauded owner could then assert his title against such reacquisition. By the laws, for instance, now existing in Spain, a person, whatever his family may be, may give to the Church one-fifth of his fortune. I cannot, however, find upon the evidence, any case in which in India more than 3 per cent. has been expended in obsequies and works, and the persons on account of whom in those cases such allowances have been made were men of superior caste and larger fortune than the deceased (247-8). ———Ss. 5 and 4—High Court of Calcutta—Jurisdiction of, over territories within operation of Act—Effect on—Jurisdiction excluded.

Act XXII of 1869, according to its true construction, excludes the jurisdiction of the Calcutta High Court as to the territories brought within the operation of the Act (Garo Hills, and Khasi and Jaintia Hills) (189).

The contention that the jurisdiction of the High Court was not so excluded is founded on the proposition that S. 4 of Act XXII of 1869 purports to remove the Garo Hills, not from the jurisdiction of the High Court, established by Her Majesty's letters patent under the authority of Imperial statutes, but only from that of the local courts, constituted by the regulations of the Bengal or by Acts of the Indian Legislature. (189).

Assuming (but not deciding) that "the Courts of Civil and Criminal Judicature," mentioned in S. 4 of the Act of 1869, were only the courts of original jurisdiction established under the Indian Regulations and Acts, their Lordships think that the supposed consequence does not follow. It may be possible that under the terms of the 8th and 9th sections of the High Courts Act (24 & 25 Vict., c. 104), together with the 27th and 28th sections of the Royal Letters Patent (1865), under which the Calcutta High Court is constituted, appeals might have gone to that court from criminal tribunals of first instance, established by the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal in the Garo, or the Khasi aud Jaintia Hills, if Act XXII of 1869 had made no other provision for such appeals. But S. 5 of that Act, distinctly authorised the Lieutenant-Governor to appoint tribunals, not of first instance only, but also of "Reference and Appeal"; and, by the notification now in question, he has done so, giving the powers of the High Court to the Commissioner of Assam, with an ultimate controlling authority to himself. Unless, therefore, the whole Act of 1869, or S. 9 of that Act, was void, as being in excess of the legislative powers of the Governor-General in Council, the jurisdiction of the High Court has been excluded (189-90). (Lord Selborne.) QUEEN v. BURAH. (1878) 5 I.A. 178 = 4 C. 172 (176-7) = 3 C.L.R. 197 = 3 Sar. 834 = 3 Suth. 556.

In the year 1869, the Indian Legislature passed Act XXII of 1869 removing the Garo Hills from the jurisdiction of the Courts of the Civil and Criminal Judicature constituted by the regulations of the Bengal Code, and vesting the administration of Civil and Criminal Justice within the same territory, in such officers as the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal might, for the purpose of tribunals of first instance, or of reference and appeal, from time to time appoint. That Act was to come into force on such day as the Lieutenant-Governor should direct. By S. 9 of the Act, the Lieutenant-Governor was empowered to extend all or any of the provisions of the Act to the Khasi and the Jaintia Hills. The Lieutenant-Governor accordingly fixed the time at which the Act should come into operation in the Garo Hills, and subsequently he extended all the provisions of the Act to the other two Hills, declaring the administration of Civil and Criminal Justice to be vested in the Commissioner of Assam, and adding that the Commissioner should exercise the powers of the High Court. Under that Act, and those notifications, the respondent was in 1876 tried by the Deputy Commissioner of Jaintia Hills upon a charge of murder. He was convicted and sentenced to death, but the sentence was commuted by the Chief Commissioner of Assam to transportation for life. The respondent presented a petition to the High Court at Calcutta ; and majority of the judges decided that the case fell within their appellate jurisdiction ; and they sent for the record of the proceedings with a view to an adjudication thereon. From that decision the appeal before their Lordships was, by special leave, brought.

The ground on which the High Court assumed jurisdiction was that S.9 of Act XXII of 1869, purporting to authorise the Lieutenant-Governor to extend the Act to the Khasi and Jaintia Hiils, was in excess of the legislative powers of the Governor-General in Council on the ground that S. 9 was not legislation, but a delegation of legislative power.

Held, that the doctrine of the majority of the High Court was erroneous, and that it rested upon a mistaken view of the powers of the Indian Legislature, and indeed of the nature and principles of legislation (193).

What has been done is this. The Governor-General in Council has determined, in the due and ordinary course of legislation, to remove a particular district from the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts and offices, and to place it under new courts and offices, to be appointed by and responsible to the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal ; leaving it to the Lieutenant Governor to say at what time that change shall take place ; and also enabling him, not to make what laws he pleases for that or any other district, but to apply by public notification to that district any law, or part of a law, which either already was, or from time to time might be, in force, by proper legislative authority, "in the other territories subject to his Government." The Legislature determined that, so far, a certain change shall take place ; but that it was expedient to leave the time, and the manner, of carrying it into effect to the discretion of the Lieutenant-Governor ; and also, that the laws which were or might be in force in the other territories subject to the same Government were such as it might be fit and proper to apply to this district also ; but that, as it was not certain that all those laws, and every part of them, could with equal convenience be so applied, it was expedient, on that point also, to entrust a discretion to the Lieutenant-Governor. This having been done as to the Garo Hills, what was done as to the Khasi and Jaintia Hills ? The Legislature decided that it was fit and proper that the adjoining districts of the Khasi and Jaintia Hills should also be removed from the jurisdiction of the existing Courts, and brought under the same provisions with the Garo Hills, not necessarily and at all events, but if and when the Lieutenant-Governor should think it desirable to do so ; and that it was also possible that it might be expedient that not all, but some only, of those provisions should be applied to that adjoining district. And accordingly the Legislature entrusted, for these purposes also, a discretionary power to the Lieutenant-Governor (194-5).

It is a fallacy to speak of the powers thus conferred upon the Lieutenant-Governor (large as they undoubtedly are) as if, when they were exercised, the efficacy of the acts done under them would be due to any other legislative authority than that of the Governor-General in Council. Their whole operation is, directly and immediately, under and by virtue of the Act XXII of 1869 itself. The proper Legislature has exercised its judgment as to place, persons, laws, powers ; and the result of that judgment has been to legislate conditionally as to all these things. The conditions having been fulfilled, the legislation is now absolute (195). (Lord Selborne.) QUEEN v. BURAH.

In the sect of Gharbari Gosavis there may be direct inheritance by the disciple to his preceptor. But this peculiar form of inheritance does not preclude the ordinary Hindu practice of adoption with the usual consequence. Adoption in the usual sense, however, may, as some witnesses suggest, be of recent introduction as a practice in this sect (357). ———Inheritance by disciple to preceptor without adoption—Right conferred by.

It would appear that in this sect (of Gharbari Gosavis) there may be direct inheritance by the disciple (chela) to his preceptor (guru). If this took place without adoption it may be that it would confer upon the disciple no right of inheritance to the collaterals of his guru. This is a point, however, which it is not necessary for their Lordships to decide (357). (Lord Phillimore.) HARIGIR KISANGIR GOSAVI v. BHARATHI VISHNU BHARATHI GOSAVI.

———Besides the disorder which prevailed generally through the Provinces, particular districts were exposed to ravages of a different description. The mountain or hill districts in India were at this time inhabited by lawless tribes, asserting a wild independence, often of a different race and different religion from the inhabitants of the plains, who were frequently subjected to marauding expeditions by their more warlike neighbours. To prevent these incursions it was necessary to guard and watch the Ghats, or mountain passes, through which these hostile descents were made; and the Mahomedan rulers established a tenure called Ghatwally tenure, by which lands were granted to individuals, often of high rank, at a low rent, or without rent, on condition of their performing these duties, and protecting and preserving order in the neighbouring districts (109-110). The inalienability of a ghatwali tenure is a settled principle of the general law and, with regard to those in Birbhum, Bengal Reg. XXIX of 1814 and Act V of 1859, which the Reglation of 1910 does not purport to affect, have specifically affirmed it. (Viscount Sumner.) THAKUR ASHUTOSH DEO GHATWAL v. BANSIDAR SHROFF.

———Custom against—Proof of—Onus.

The allegation that a ghatwali estate is not in the whole or in part alienable, or, if alienable, is only so for the life of the alienor, must largely depend on local and family custom, and such custom, if proved to exist, may supersede the general law, though in other respects the general law may govern the relations of parties outside that custom (27). It was contended that Handwa is in any case locally in Kharakpur, and that, by a well-established local custom now always recognised, Kharakpur ghatwalli lands are alienable. There is no ground for the contention that the custom of Kharakpur relied upon has any application to ghatwalli tenures, which, like Handwa, are independent of the Kharakpur zemindary, even though they may be not far off Kharakpur.

The decisions which have held that certain ghatwalli tenures in the district of Kharakpur are alienable with the consent of the Zemindar can have no reference to ghatwalli tenures not under the zemindar nor forming part of his zemindari. Division of, upon death or by alienation.

———Prohibition against—Reason of.

Ghatwalli tenures are not divisible on the death of a ghatwal, but descend to the eldest son. The ghatwalli lands are granted for particular purposes, especially of police, and to divide them into small portions amongst the heirs of the ghatwals would be to defeat the very ends for which the grants were made (122).

The same principle which precludes a division of a tenure upon death must also apply to a division by alienation. Their Lordships are of opinion that the tenure is not transferable or saleable in execution of a decree (122-3).

If the jaghir were transferable without the consent of Government by voluntary sale, or sale in execution, or otherwise, there would be no security that the transferee would be a proper person to discharge the duties in respect of which the lands are held at the reduced rent. The transferee might be a person of questionable or even of bad character (124). (Sir Barnes Peacock.) RAJAH NILMONI SINGH v. BAKRANATH SINGH. (1882) 9 I. Execution sale of—Validity.

———Zemindar's assent—Effect—Kharakpur ghatwal.

A Kharakpur ghatwalli is not inalienable, and may be transferred by the ghatwal or sold in execution of a decree against him if such transfer or sale is assented to by the Zemindar (27-8).

There is no foundation for the argument that, though the ghatwal might alien, it could only be for the life of the alienor. When once it is established that the ghatwal had the power of alienation as before stated, that power forms an integral portion of his right and interest in the ghatwalli, and there is no evidence whatever to limit it to an alienation for his own life and no longer (28). Extent of lands included in.

———Evidence—Issumnovisee returns—Nature of—Admissibility in evidence of—Value of.

Issumnovisee returns are returns made by the Police generally on the information of the ghatwally holder, stating his name, the quantity of land which he held, and the Putnee rent which he paid for it. Different courts at different times have given greater or less weight to those returns. All the courts agree that they are admissible in evidence. In each particular case the courts have considered what weight ought to be given to them, and it is nothing very surprising if the courts at different times have not given exactly the same weight to those documents (264, 266). (Lord Justice Mellish.) FARQUHARSON v. DWARKANATH SINGH. (1871) 14 M. I. A. 259 = 8 B. L. R 504 = 2 Sar. 708 = 16 W. R. P. C. 29 = 2 Suth. 469.

———Issumnovisee returns old showing lesser extent—Possession long of greater extent—Evidence of—Effect—Preference in case of.

The suit was for possession and enhancement of rent brought by the plaintiff, the Putnidar, against the Respondent, D, the Ghatwal, and the Government on the ground of encroachment of lands in his Talook not held ghatwally. The question was whether the respondent, D, the Ghatwal, and entitled as such to certain ghatwally lands within the appellants' Putnee Talook, held lands in excess of what he was entitled to, and was liable to pay rent in respect of such excess to the plaintiff, the Putneedar, for the lands which the respondent, D, alleged he held ghatwally.

Extent of lands included in—(Contd.)

The evidence which the plaintiff produced in support of his case entirely consisted of three documents, called Issumnovisee returns, for three separate years. In one of those returns, the then holder of the estate which D, held, the ghatwally holder had returned that the quantity of his land was 100 bighas. That was the sole evidence of the plaintiff. He did not produce any evidence at all to show how it happened that if 100 bighas was all that the ghatwally holder was entitled to in the years 1811, 1812, and 1813, that quantity of 100 bighas had increased to the very large quantity of 3,000 bighas at the time when the sale at which the plaintiff himself purchased the Putni took place. On the other hand, the respondent, D, produced evidence to show that as far back as living memory went, the whole quantity of 3,000 bighas had been held.

Held, that the long uninterrupted possession of the Ghatwalli holder ought clearly to have greater weight than those returns (265-6).

Weight must be given to ancient possession, and there may be a variety of causes why incorrect returns may have been made in the years 1811, 1812, and 1813. It may have been that the Police Officer was careless and did not care about what he returned, or it may have been that the ghatwally holder at that time had some reasons for giving incorrect information, or possibly it may have been that the ancient Ghatwals originally held only 100 bighas but that the estate had increased to 3,000 bighas many years before and before the creation of the Putnee, which, notwithstanding the Bengal Regulation VIII of 1819 would entitle the ghatwally-holder to hold the whole quantity. Their Lordships are of opinion, that the courts in this particular case have given quite as much weight to these returns as they deserve (266). Forfeiture of—Grounds.

———Services—Repudiation express of obligation of—Incapacity of heir to render even vicarious.

Since the (ghatwali) tenure is a service tenure, the lands are liable to forfeiture if the obligation of service is expressly repudiated, while the rights of the ruling power are similarly sufficiently safe-guarded by holding that the succession of an heir incapable of rendering even the vicarious service involved in the provision of an armed force, might be treated as being in itself a ground of forfeiture in the person of that successor, if not in the persons of the entire family, for it is what might be called an anticipatory repudiation.

Quaere whether and to what extent an appearance of personal unfitness in a particular heir would operate to disable him from succession as ghatwal. ———Office of personal character.

It is objected that true heritability is inconsistent with a ghatwalli tenure when the office is of a personal character. A jaghir may, it is true, be held by a ghatwal on the terms of personal employment and service of the strictest kind and in the most complete subordination. In such a case selection and appointment are the natural commencement of the service, and its determination in fact involves the determination of this highly personal nature. Where everything depends on personal qualifications and exertions a heritable tenure is out of place. On the other hand, services may be due in bulk and the obligation of the ghatwal may consist, not in personal guardianship of a particular post, but in providing the service of others who are competent to discharge the services in person. The obligation to embody and keep up an armed force of 300 men with an appropriate staff of officers is pre-eminently an obligation of this kind. It is personal in that the grantee under this tenure is himself bound to the provision of this force from time to time, and is not merely chargeable in respect of the expense, or bound to make a contribution to the expense of forces embodied and kept on foot by others. It is personal in that the lands are granted upon this tenure in order that out of their produce the obligation in question may be discharged by the grantee. It is, however, impersonal in that the very nature of the service is rather one of purveyance than of arms. For this purpose the ghatwal must be a person of property, and for that reason he is the grantee of lands as ghatwalli lands ; but he need not be himself a soldier or watchman, and for that reason also the lands, though ghatwalli lands, may descend to heirs without personal selection and appointment. Inalienability of—Governments' right to enforce.

———Cessation of — Release or discharge of right—Necessity—Sonthal Parganas Rural Police Regulation IV of 1910—Scope and Effect of.

So far from being on its face a Regulation altering the general law as recognised by Regulation 29 of 1814 and Act V of 1859, this local Regulation (Sonthal Parganas Rural Police Regn. IV of 1910) only brings in ghatwals as zemindars, incidentally and for the sake of uniformity. It was passed, alio intuitu, to make better provision for local police administration, and it is essentially of a temporary character and of shifting application. The Regulation contains nothing which can be construed as or operates to the same effect as a release or discharge of the Governments' right to have the inalienability of the tenure enforced unless and until it effectually puts an end to it. The rule on this point was thus laid down in L. R. 51 I. A. 37 at 68 :—

"To terminate the ghatwali character of the lands it is necessary to find something done or omitted to be done on the part of the Government, as the grantors, which would have the legal effect of a surrender and re-grant of the lands on new terms, or, at any rate, of a release of the right to appoint the ghatwal and call for the performance of the services." ———Release or discharge of—What amounts to—Muchilika—Construction.

Where the terms of a muchilika were as follows :—

"I will not allow any thief, badmash, or absconder to live within the jurisdiction of my talook, neither will I plot or conspire against Government nor help others in doing the same. I will not discharge, without the order of Government, such persons under me who have been engaged in doing police duties ; if it be found necessary to discharge any such person, I will first send an information thereof or report his faults to the authorities, and abide by such orders as will be passed by them."

Held, that under the terms of his appointment the ghatwal held under conditions which were more extensive than that of merely supporting within his Zemindari the police, in respect of whom he had to pay the amount determined by the Deputy Commissioner, and which were also substantial enough to leave his inability to alienate unaffected as if Regulation IV of 1910 and its predecessors had not passed.

The words of the muchilika clearly import some kind of personal organisation, appointed, directed and discharged by the ghatwal, over and above or it may be under and subject to, the regular rural police, and out of that nucleus an important revival of the old ghatwalli obligations might at any time arise.

What has here been done on the part of the Government is a mere provision for the machinery of police administration and had not the effect of a release or discharge of iis right to enforce the inalienability of the tenure. Mocurrari Istimrary proprietorship in.

———Not acquired by non-preformance of services for a long time.

The decision of the High Court must be rested on legal assumption that, if during a sufficiently long period the incumbent of the office of ghatwal does not happen to be called on to render the services which he is bound to render when required, the quality and incidents of his tenure of ghatwalli lands change, at any rate so long as this abeyance of the services lasts, and that he becomes, to the prejudice of his heirs—who are, be it said, heirs of ghatwalli lands with the advantages as well as the disadvantages attaching thereto—a full mukarrari istimrari proprietor for the time being (67). To terminate the ghatwalli character of the lands, it seems to their Lordships that it is necessary to find something done or omitted to be done on the part of the Government as the grantors, which would have the legal effect of a surrender and regrant of the lands on new terms or, at any rate, of a release of the right to appoint the ghatwal and call for the performance of the services (68). GHATWALLY TENURE—(Contd.)

———Property subject of tenure—Rights of ghatwal and the family over.

The ghatwalli tenure is ordinarily hereditary, the estate descending to such male member of the family as the Zemindar approves as competent, and it is the right of the family, so long as they have male members competent to perform the duties, to have one or more of them appointed ghatwals. The ghatwal could put other members of the family into minor offices and grant them subordinate interests commonly called jotes, and he could and would generally provide for the family in the manner expected of its head. But this is a long way off making him a trustee for the family or treating the ghatwalli estate as possessed by the family and reducing the ghatwal to the position of karta or managing head of the family. The incidents of ghatwalli tenure are not such as to give the family any rights over the property while it is in the hands of the ghatwal. Regulation 29 of 1814 — Preamble to — Ghatwally tenure of nature described in—Jaghir held on tenure analogous to.

———What amounts to.

Neither the origin of a jaghir nor the precise time at which it was created was known, but it appeared that as far back as 1771, the villages of which it was composed were held by jaghirdars who paid to Government two-thirds of the annual value thereof as revenue, and retained the other one-third as remuneration for the services under which the jaghir was held. The villages included in the jaghir were permanently settled as part of the Zemindary of Pachete, of which the appellant was the Zemindar. In fixing the Government revenue at the time of decennial settlement, the lands included in the jaghir were assessed at the two-thirds then payable by the jagirdar to the Government, and one-third retained by the jaghirdar in lieu of services formed no part of the assets of the Zemindary in respect of which the Government revenue was fixed.

Jaghirdars were successively appointed or approved by Government up to the time of G, who was appointed in 1816 in the place of R, who was dismissed for misconduct.

In February 1817, G petitioned the Magistrate for leave to associate D with himself as headman ; that was sanctioned, and they divided the jaghir and the duties. On the death of G, his son applied to be installed as his successor, but R, having applied to he reinstated, his application was granted. In 1834 R, attempted to oust D, but that was not allowed and the jaghir ever since remained divided.

Held, that whether the tenure was a ghatwalli or not it was analogous to a ghatwalli tenure of the nature described in the preamble to Regulation 29 of 1814 (120). (Sir Barnes Peacock.) RAJAH NILMONI SINGH v. BAKRANATH SINGH. (1382) 9 I.A. 104=9 C. 187 (203-4)=4 Sar. 385.

———Sale in son's hands of, in execution of decree against father—Validity of.

The question for decision was, whether the suit mauzahs, comprised in a jaghir mehal, which had been held by the respondents' father during his lifetime, and which at his death descended to the respondent, as his heir, and to which the plaintiff (respondent) was appointed by Government, were liable to be seized in execution of a decree against the father as assets by descent in the hands of the plaintiff, his son.

It was found that the tenure in question, whether it was a ghatwalli or not, was analogous to a ghatwalli tenure of the nature described in the preamble to Regulation 29 of 1814.

Held, affirming the High Court, that the tenure was not liable to be seized in execution of a decree against the father as assets by descent in the hands of the son (122-4.) (Sir Barnes Peacock.) RAJAH NILMONI SINGH v. BAKRANATH SINGH. (1882) 9 I. A. 104=4 Sar. 335=9 C. 187 (206-8).

Resumption of.

The Government having wrongfully resumed certain ghatwalli lands held upon a tenure, by which they were liable to a certain rent and also to certain ghatwalli services were directed to refund mesne profits thereof, which consisted of the rent paid by the ghatwals under a settlement in force with them until the resumption was set aside,

Held, that such refund should be made by paying to the Zemindar the rent which was due to him by the ghatwals under the tenures, and returning to the ghatwals the remainder of the money (190-1). The question was who was entitled to the mesne profits payable by Government in respect of Ghatwalli lands improperly resumed and re-assessed by them. Their Lordships observed :—That a portion of the fund belongs to the Zemindar their Lordships think highly probable, if only on account of his quit-rent or quit-rents, fallen into arrear, but possibly also he may have a just claim on more than this portion, or even the whole fund, in respect of services which the Ghatwals were, or had been, under an obligation to perform, and have, from any cause whatever, not performed. Subject to that deduction, or those deductions, as the case may be, in favour of the Zemindar, there appears to their Lordships a title fit to be considered to the whole fund in the Ghatwals who were in the actual enjoyment of the lands, or their representatives (490-1.) The question was as to the validity of a claim made by the East India Company to resume, for the purposes of revenue assessment, against the Raja of Kharakpur, 755 bighas of land, part of his Zamindari. The lands sought to be resumed, were of what was called Ghatwally tenure, and the great question in the case was, whether lands of that description were liable to be resumed under Regulation I of 1793, S. 8, cl. 4, relating to Tannah, or police establishments.

Held, under all the circumstances of the case, that the suit lands were not properly within the meaning of the clause relied upon by the respondent, that they were a part of the zemindary of Kharakpur, and were included in the Settlement for that Zemindary, and covered by the jumma assessed upon it (132). The fact of the Government's having consented to dispense with the services in question as regards the zemindar, and the zemindar's having agreed with the Government to pay an additional revenue in consideration of the Government having absolved them from the services, does not entitle the zemindar, as between him and the ghatwals, to treat them as trespassers, and turn them out of possession (185). The tenure was an hereditary tenure. The purchaser sought to resume the mouzahs on the ground that the ghatwalli services had ceased to be necessary. The Government disputed his right to resume.

———Mitakshara rules as to—Applicability of.

The admitted facts that a ghatwalli estate is impartible, that is to say, not subject to partition, and that the eldest son succeeds to the whole to the exclusion of his brothers seem to exclude the application of the Mitakshara rule, that the sons on birth each take an equal estate with the father, and are entitled to partition (27).

The doctrines of the Mithakshara, which govern in some districts the Hindu law of inheritance, are not to their full extent applicable to a ghatwalli tenure. By the general Hindu law of Inheritance, where the Mithakshara does not prevail, the heirs are generally selected because of their capability to exercise certain religious rites for the benefit of the deceased. Where, however, the Mithakshara governs, each son immediately on his birth takes a share equal to his father in the ancestral immoveable estate. Having regard to the origin and nature of ghatwalli tenures and their purposes and incidents, it is admitted that such a teuure is in some particulars distinct from and cannot be governed by either the general objects of Hindu inheritance as above stated, or by the before-quoted rule of the Mitakshara (26-7). Handwa estates had been and were inalienable and passed unencumbered to the defendant as successor on the death of Udit Singh, the mortgages notwithstanding. Two main questions arose : the first, whether the estates were ever inalienable at all ; and the second, even if so, whether before the dates of the mortgages they had not become alienable in full. Both the courts below rejected the defence ; the Sub-Judge mainly on the first point ; the High Court while accepting the original inalienability of the estates, definitely upon the second. The appeal to the Privy Council was by the defendant.

Held, reversing the Courts below :

(1) The pattah of 1776 and the sanad of 1794 contain words of grant and purport to make grants on behalf of and in the name of the East India Company. They must be so interpreted, nor can this construction be defeated merely because there may be ground for thinking that the grantees were already holders of these lands under earlier grants or on customary service terms. The tenure is therefore a Government tenure.

(2) As the grants are expressed to be istimrari mukarrari grants, and as in fact the lands have for generations descended in the family of the defendant from ancestor to heir, they are a perpetual and hereditary tenure.

(3) The express obligation imposed on the grantees, as an integral part of the grant, to support a specified number of barkandases, and with them to attend the Huzur when required, shows that the tenure is a service tenure and is ghatwalli in its nature. (4) A tenure so granted is inalienable and indivisible, and cannot be sold in execution of a decree against the person of the incumbent of the office of ghatwal for the time being. (5) Neither by the terms of the grant nor by the general law applying to such ghatwalli tenures is an actual appointment of the next heir to be ghatwalli in the room of his predecessor requisite, nor is actual performance of the stipulated ghatwalli services from time to time necessary. Readiness and willingness to perform them when required may be inferred where there is no proof of any refusal to perform and where performance within a reasonable time, if required, is not shown to have become impossible. Zemindari—Mouzahs withn ambit of—Permanent and fixed ghatwally tenure in respect of—Claim to.

———Evidence of, sufficient to overcome mere title of zemindar.

The appellant was the zemindar of a taluk within which were comprised the suit mouzahs. The appellant sued for a declaration that the defendants-respondents had no rights, mokurrari or dur-mokurrari, in the suit mouzahs, and for possession of the same.

As the case came finally to be presented for judgment on evidence, the appellant had really proved nothing beyond his title as Zemindar of the talook within which the villages were situated, which in deed was not disputed. He gave neither statement nor evidence as to how or when his title had its origin. The only evidence of possession by the appellant related to dates so lalte as 1868 and 1869, in which years two pattahs were granted by the appellant in favour of D of the whole of the talook within which the suit mouzahs were situated at stated rents. There was, however, no evidence that any rents were asked for or received by him from the possessors of the mouzahs in question.

Against the appellant's title to the zemindari, without any evidence of possession of any of the mouzahs in question, there was proved uninterrupted possession by the respondents and their predecessors from a date before the appellant's ancestor acquired a title, and in deed it might be presumed for upwards of a century. The mouzahs were held throughout that time for the payment of a uniform rent, and there were other considerations to be found in the parol evidence which supported the view that the tenure was ghatwalli, Held, affirming the High Court, that the presumptions in favour of a fixed and permanent ghatwalli tenure arising from the long-continued possession of the respondents and their predecessors at a uniform rent were sufficient to overcome the mere title of the appellant as zemindar (67). It was contended that the Martial Law (Further Extension) Ordinance IV of 1919 by depriving British subjects in India of the right to be tried in the ordinary course by the established Courts of law, and by empowering a commission appointed under the Martial Law Ordinance I of 1919 to try them, affected the unwritten laws or constitution whereon the allegiance of His Majesty's subjects in India depends, and was accordingly invalidated by sub-S. 2 of S. 65 of the Government of India Act, 1915. It is not easy to understand how the substitution for the ordinary Indian Courts—which are themselves ot statutory origin—of another tribunal of a judicial character can be said to affect in any way the unwritten laws or constitution of the country (137-8). ———S. 65 (3)—Law contravening—Invalidity of—Extent of—S. 84 of Act—S. 2 of Government of India Amendment) Act of 1916.

On the strength of S. 65, sub-S. 3 of the Government of India Act of 1915 it was argued that the Martial Law (Further Extension) Ordinance IV of 1919, if it subjects any person whatever to be tried for his life by a Commisson in lieu of the ordinary Courts of law or Courts-martial, is an infringement of the provision which prevents the Governor-General in Council from empowering any Court other than a High Court to sentence to death any of His Majesty's subjects born in Europe, and accordingly that the Ordinance is void not only as to persons falling within sub-S. 3 of S. 65 but altogether. The answer to this contention is to be found in S. 2 of the Government of India (Amendment) Act, 1916, which provides that there shall be inserted at the end of S. 84 of the Act of 1915 the following words: "A law made by any authority in British India and repugnant to any provision of this or any other Act of Parliament, shall, to the extent of that repugnancy, but not otherwise, be void."

If the Ordinance IV contravenes S. 65, sub-S. 3 of the Act of 1915, it may properly be described as "repugnant" to that section so far as European British subjects are concerned, and if so it is void to the extent of that repugnancy but not otherwise (139-40). The question was whether there was such indorsement of Government promissory notes made payable to a deceased Mahomedan lady as would be sufficient in itself to transfer the legal property in them. The indorsements, whether open or special, were made by affixing the seal of the deceased lady. That act was done after her death by the hand of one of her sons, and the indorsement did not purport to be other than the mother's.

Much evidence was given with a view to show that ladies of rank commonly indorsed Government notes by putting their seals on them, and that it was not unusual for purchasers to buy notes, bearing such seals, from members of their families in the confidence that the seals were properly affixed. The Courts below found, and their Lordships concurred in the finding, that the purchaser bought the notes in question in the bona fide belief that the seal had been properly affixed.

The appeal arose out of a suit brought by the plaintiff against B, and the plaintiff's brother, M, to recover nine Government promissory notes of the amount of Rs. 27,000, which the plaint alleged to have been wrongfully sold and transferred by M to B. Although the transactions took place some time between November 1857, and March 1858, the plaint in the suit was not filed until the 6th of September, 1864. B was the transferee of the said notes, and he resisted the suit.

The said notes were made payable to the deceased mother of the plaintiff and M. They were indorsed after her death by affixing her seal. That act was done by the hand of M, and it was not suggested that the indorsement purported to be other than the mother's. The defence rested upon the ground that special circumstances were shown which in equity precluded the plaintiff from defeating the sale to B. It was clear that M who sold, or took part in the sale of the notes, as papers bearing genuine indorsements, was precluded from asserting that such indorsements were not genuine; and the contention for B was that, as between the brothers, the plaintiff had acquiesced in what was done with the notes, and that both were acting in collusion to set up a false case with a view to obtain their value from B.

Held, that B had established such a case, and that it would therefore be inequitable to allow the plaintiff to succeed in the suit (177). MIRZA AHMED ABBAS KHAN v. SAH MUTHRA DASS.

GOVERNMENT PROMISSORY NOTES—(Concld.)

Plaintiff sued for the restitution of Promissory Notes, commonly called company's paper, of the Indian Government, or alternatively, for the recovery of their value. His case was that the suit Government Promissory Notes belonged to his and the second defendant's mother, that on her death he and the second defendant became entitled to them; that they were secured under the separate seals of the heirs, in a house belonging to the estate, in which the mother died; but that the second defendant broke the seals, carried off the property, and alone sold and purported to transfer it to the 1st defendant. The relief prayed by him as above stated was against the first defendant. The courts below dismissed the suit, holding that the onus of proof rested on the plaintiff to rebut a presumable bona fide title by transfer in the first defendant.

Held that, in the circumstances of the case, no such presumption could be raised, and that the case ought to be inquired into on proper pleadings and evidence (519-20).

The case made as to these papers is, that they were not in a state wherein a transfer, by delivery to a bona fide holder, would confer a title. On the contrary, it is stated that the legal title was in the mother, and required a transfer by indorsement from her or all her heirs. An invalid transfer might still confer a valid equitable title, either in part or in entirety; but such a transfer, being exceptional and dependent on special circumstances cannot be raised by legal intendment or presumption. Consequently the plaintiff's case required an answer, unless met on other grounds. Collusion between the brothers if alleged and proved, would have constituted a valid defence (519-20). ———Words "Auras putra poutradik" in—Meaning of—Females if included.

The words "auras putra poutradik" in sanads for babuana grants are words of limitation meaning sons born of the loins and are not words of general inheritance which would include female as well as male heirs (285-6).

The decision in L. R. 8 I. A. 46 to the effect that in Bengal in a gift to a man the vernacular words "putra poutradi krama" would be read as words of general inheritance, and would include female as well as male heirs where by law the estate would descend to such heirs is inapplicable to babuana grants. Such grants could not be made under the ordinary Hindu law, but they are authorised by the custom which excludes females from the succession. Their Lordships must regard the words "auras putra poutradik" as used in these sanads as words of limitation consistent with the custom, and not as words of general inheritance (286). Construction of.

———Annuity—Grant in lieu of—Villages themselves—Grant of — Assignment of the amount representing the annuity out of the revenue of the villages—Test.

An ancestor of the plaintiff for services rendered to the Government had received a grant of Rs. 4,000 per annum. In 1844 his successor prayed that the grant might be changed into a grant of villages in Salsetti. This after some negotiations was done in 1847. The deed of grant then granted, after a preamble narrating the original grant of Rs. 4,000 to the family and the request that it might be exchanged for a grant of villages, went on as follows :—

"The aforesaid villages of Juhu and Vile Paria in the island of Salsette are hereby assigned to you and your heirs in perpetuity from the year A.D. 1847-8. The particulars of the cultivation, etc., founded on the Jamabandi of 1842-3, and the conditions of the grant are as follows" :—

Then followed a long and minute description of the villages, the boundaries and the various lands from which revenue was levied, calculated partly on the lands and partly on the produce of brab trees which were tapped for toddy. All the particulars referred to lands as held by various ryots or sutidars. The list ended with a summation of the revenue at the sum of Rs. 4,679-1-8. From that was deducted "the amount of your inam Rs. 4,000." It was added that there were 97 undrawn brab trees for which "the grantee is to pay Rs. 20-14-4," making the whole sum payable by him as the surplus over the Rs. 4,000, Rs. 700. Subsequently, on condition of the surrender of contain other lands not included in the grant, the Rs. 700 was reduced to Rs. 200. The deed then went on with various conditions referred to in the judgment of their Lordships. The villages consisted partly of land occupied by sutidars and partly of land not so occupied.

The Courts below held that the grant was neither an absolute grant of the soil nor a mere assignment of the revenues but was merely an assignment of Rs. 4,000 out of the revenue of the villages subject to the conditions of the grant,

GRANT—(Contd.)

Held, reversing the Courts below, that the grant was a grant of the villages.

In their Lordships' view the decision of the Courts below as to the effect of the grant is a complete inversion of the scheme of the deed prompted rather by a view as to what in the circumstances the Government ought to have done rather than by a strict observation of what they did do. No doubt it was clear that the Government intended and thought that what they were giving was worth Rs. 4,000 ; but they were not giving Rs. 4,000. On the contrary they were giving something instead of Rs. 4,000 which at that time they were paying in cash. Now what did the Government grant by the deed ? Indubitably they granted not money but villages. These are the only words of conveyance. Doubtless, the villages are granted under conditions. But these conditions will, on analysis, be found to leave the matter of the grant exactly as it was, i.e., that the only grant is the grant of the villages. ———Community generally or two individuals thereof personally—Grant to.

The appeal arose out of a controversy between various members of the Parsi community, and related to certain land situated in the Secunderabad cantonment, on a portion of which stood a Parsi tower of silence. The appellants claimed title to the land as descendants and representatives in title of the original founders, alleging that the founders were in their lifetime the owners of the land in question. The respondents, who were defendants in the suit, on the other hand, asserted that the land had been granted to the whole Parsi community for a public purpose, and to enure for the benefit of that community generally for all time, by the cantonment authority.

Held, on a consideration of the documentary evidence in the case, that the grant of the land in suit was to the two founders (predecessors in title of the appellants) personally, and not to the Parsi community. (Sir Arthur Wilson.) PESTONJI JIVANJI v. SHAPURJI.

———Correspondence between parties prior to grant—Reference to—Permissibility.

In a case in which the construction of a grant was in question the trial Judge examined the correspondence which took place between the parties before the deed in question was granted, and he came to his opinion on the true meaning of the deed, as he put it himself, "after a careful consideration of the deed in the light of the correspondence."

Held, that that way of approaching the true construction of the deed was quite illegitimate. Nothing is better settled than that when parties have entered into a formal contract that contract must be construed according to its own terms and not be explained or interpreted by the antecedent communings which led up to it. This is especially true of a conveyance. Thus even, if there has been a formal antecedent contract, that contract cannot be looked at to control the terms of the conveyance ; much less can mere communings which could only show what parties meant to do but cannot show what they did. ———Estate conveyed—Mafee-birt-tenure—Grant as, of ancestral properties in which grantee was co-sharer with grantor, in lieu of grantee's share—Service by grantee to grantor—Stipulation in grant for.

The words of a grant to B were :—"I, S, do hereby declare that I have given B, Mouzah S, with all its cardinal boundaries and the julkur, bunkur, and roads, as a ' mafee-birt-tenure ' in lieu of his share in Mouzah D, and he can take possession thereof in perfect security, and continue to do service to me, and that whoever of my descendants should become Rajah, he should maintain this grant."

Mouzahs D and S had been given in lieu of service to an ancestor of B, so that they had both of them originally been ancestral property. The grant above set out was made to B for the purpose of dividing that property which they had held jointly, and giving B the interest in Mouzah S in lieu of the joint interest which he previously had in both properties. The Mouzah S had actually descended without dispute from B, the original donee, to his son, and from his son to his mother.

Held, on a construction of the grant and on the evidence in the case, that the tenure created by the grant was an hereditary, and not a mere life, tenure, and that the property conveyed was property which went from heir to heir in the ordinary way of Hindu property.

The grant, no doubt, says that it was made in lieu of service ; but there is nothing to show that that was a service of a kind which prevented the property granted being ancestral property descending in the ordinary way. RAJAH MAHENDRA SINGH v. JOKHA SINGH. (1873) 2 Suth. 802 = 19 W. R. 211.

———Estate conveyed—Male descendants of a person—Grant to be continued to the—Female descendant's right to share in, so long as there is no failure of male descendants.

It is impossible to hold that an order that an estate shall " be continued to the male descendants " of a certain person means that it shall be continued to the male and female descendants of that person so long as there is no failure of male descendants. Such a grant is not one in general terms. The expression " to the male descendants " is a very limited expression and the word " to " can have no other than its ordinary meaning attributed to it. It cannot be treated as meaning " during the existence of " or " pending the failure of," and even if the word were capable of being so extended, there would still be difficulty in holding that, from the general words, a general grant could anywhere be evolved in terms sufficiently wide to include female descendants within its scope (301). The question in the suit out of which the appeal arose was whether an istimrari mokurrari pottah granted in 1850 by the then holder of an impartible estate to his son-in-law of certain mouzahs which were part of the zemindary was for the life of the grantee or for perpetuity to be enjoyed generation after generation.

Some of the documents tendered in evidence consisted of mokurraris granted by the same individual to his three brothers, his brother in-law, who had married his only sister, and his five sons-in-law and two other relatives, and also of mokurraris granted by the son of the grantor of the pottah in question.

Held, that such evidence could only prove a custom of the family of the grantor of the pottah in question, and what was understood in his family to be the meaning of "istimrari mokurrari" when used without any other words (209). Meaning of word, in legal transactions in India.

———English law technical meaning—Inapplicability of.

In considering whether a particular grant carries with it the mineral rights in the soil, it is important to avoid giving the words used in connection with legal transactions in India the special and technical meaning that they possess in this country. According to the English law, the word "grant" is strictly applicable to the conveyance at common law of remainders, reversions, and incorporeal hereditaments, which do not lie in livery, or of which livery could not be given. But in connection with the present dispute, the word has no such meaning. (*Lord Buckmaster, L. ———Spiritual preceptor—Grant of non-religious lands by former to latter—Appanage or endowment of office—Personal inam of grantee—Test.

Properties, non-religious and religious, were granted at various times by the Raja of Tanjore to a person who was his guru or spiritual preceptor. Shortly after the escheat of the Tanjore Raj in 1855 inquiries were directed by the Government with a view of ascertaining whether the properties so granted were service lands, that is, lands enjoyed or endowments of offices held by servants or ministers of the Rajah, which would escheat upon the termination of the Raj, or whether they had been bestowed as personal grants; and a report was made which was acted upon by the Government to the effect that the non-religious properties were not service lands but personal grants and consequently had not escheated. Thereupon new inam grants in confirmation of the original grants were made by the Government to R, a descendant of the grantee. The confirmation grants of the non-religious lands described them as the personal inams of the grantee to be held by him as his absolute property to hold or dispose of as he thought proper, subject to the quit-rent. In some of the grants the inam was said to be tax-free and hereditary, and that on failure of lineal heirs it would lapse to the state.

In a suit by the younger son of R against his elder brother for partition of the non-religious lands, held that there was nothing in the documents, or in any of the other circumstances of the case, to take the descent of the non-religious lands out of the ordinary rule of inheritance, and that they were therefore partible (6).

The original grants of the non-religious lands show no indication that they were made by way of endowment of an office. The utmost that can be said on behalf of that contention is that the grantee is sometimes described as a royal priest. But this is a mere description. A suit instituted in the District Court by a Hindu father for an order directing the defendant, to whom he had entrusted the custody and education of his infant sons, to hand them over to the plaintiff, was transferred to the High Court under cl. 13 of the Letters Patent, 1865. The trial Judge in the High Court made an order declaring the infants wards of court, and declaring under S. 7 of the Guardians and Wards Act, 1890, that the plaintiff was their guardian so as to prolong their minorities until they attained respectively the age of 21 years.

Held that assuming that, in the exercise of its general jurisdiction over infants, the High Court had jurisdiction to declare the infants to be wards of Court, an order declaring a guardian could only be made if their interests required it (323-4). A Hindu father, who had purported to entrust the custody and education of his infant sons to the defendant, subsequently purported to revoke the authority so entrusted and demanded the restoration by the defendant of the custody of his children to his own custody. Subsequently, the father instituted a suit against the defendant in the District Court of Chingleput for a declaration that he was entitled to ———Division of—Threefold or fourfold.

Ss. 11 to 18 of the Royal Charter which regulates the Bombay High Court, are a group of clauses headed "Civil Jurisdiction of the High Court." Ss. 11 and 12 describe the local limits of the ordinary original civil jurisdiction, which is said to extend to all kinds of suits within those limits except small cause suits. S. 13 gives to the High Court power to remove and to try as a Court of extraordinary original jurisdiction any suit falling within the jurisdiction of any Court subject to its superintendence, when it shall think proper, either on agreement of the parties, or for the purposes of justice. Ss. 15 and 16 confer appellate jurisdiction. S. 17 confers authority over infants, idiots, and lunatics. S. 18 ordains that the Court for relief of insolvent debtors shall be held before one of the Judges of the High Court, and that the High Court and any such Judge shall have such powers as are constituted by the laws relating to insolvent debtors in India.

It was argued that the passages of the Charter which have just been epitomized divide the jurisdiction into four classes, ordinary original, extraordinary original, appellate, and those special matters which are the subject of special and separate provisions. But their Lordships are of opinion that the expression "ordinary jurisdiction" embraces all such as is exercised in the ordinary course of law and without any special step being necessary to assume it ; and that it is opposed to extraordinary jurisdiction which the Court may assume at its discretion upon special occasions and by special orders. They are confirmed in this view by observing that in the next group of clauses, which indicate the law to be applied by the Court to the various classes of cases, there is not a fourfold division of jurisdiction, but a threefold one, into ordinary, extraordinary, and appellate (162). ———Original and appellate jurisdictions—Distinction—Law applicable to the two jurisdictions—Distinction.

By the amalgamation of the two systems of Judicature, and the establishment of the High Courts by Letters Patent under the powers given by the 24th and 25th Vict., c. 104, and the 28th Vict., c. 15, the powers and jurisdiction of the Supreme Court with some slight modification of the latter, were transferred to the High Court, to be exercised by it as a Court of original jurisdiction ; and the powers and jurisdiction of the appellate Mofussil Courts were transferred to it, to be exercised by it as an appellate Court. But the law to be administered by it as a Court of original jurisdiction was substantially that previously administered by the Supreme Court ; whilst that to be administered by it on appeal from the Mofussil Courts was necessarily that of those Courts. The Code of Procedure of 1859 was indeed made the procedure of the Court in its original as well as in its appellate jurisdiction, and superseded the procedure which had previously obtained in the Supreme Court. But that Code did not touch the subject of limitation, which continued to be regulated by Act XIV of 1859 (486-7). (*Sir James W. A person in dedicating land to public use may, of course, place such limits as he wishes upon the dedication, if he makes those limits clear and definite. That is to say, he may announce to the public that a certain road is dedicated to it as access, say, to a particular building or for a particular purpose. But there can be no such thing in law as a public right of way, constituted by dedication to only a section of the public. As Baron Parke said: "There may be a dedication to the public for a limited purpose, as for a footway, horse-way, or drift-way; but there cannot be a dedication to a limited part of the public" (31). The village of Tiruvendipuram contained an ancient Vaishnava temple dedicated to Devanayaka Swami. Annexed to it was the shrine of a saint Vedanta Desika, who was held in great veneration by the Vadagalais. The Tengalais, on the other hand, worshipped a saint said to belong to more modern times and called Manavala Mahamuni. The Vadagalai inhabitants of the village sued for a declaration of their right to prohibit public worship in the village of the idol of the Tengalais and processions in its honour, and for an injunction.

The plaintiffs based their claim to relief on the allegation that the Vadagalais were originally the owners of all the lands in the village, and only allowed houses to be built and streets formed subject to the reservation that no worship or procession of a Tengalai idol should be permitted there. They contended that, even if strict proof of that allegation were wanting, a conditional or limited dedication of the streets to the public should be permitted, and that at any rate they had acquired, by immemorial usage and custom, the right to prevent the worship and processions of any alien deity in their streets.

There was no trace of any evidence tending to show that the site of the village was at any time the private property of the Vadagalais. The village was an ordinary ryotwari village. The streets were public streets vested at the date of suit under the Madras Act V of 1884 in the local board.

Held, that the suit had been rightly dismissed by the Courts below.

If a twice-born Hindu migrates across the sea to Burma and marries a Burmese woman, that in itself may not necessarily deprive him of his Hindu status in the eye of the law. But if he has descendants who have been born and have always lived in Burma, and who have intermarried with its people, then, even though they may form a community of their own which inherits many traces of Hindu usage, if the usages and religion are of a character very divergent from Hinduism, the community cannot be regarded as Hindu (564). Convert to Christianity.

———Hindu law if applicable to—Effect of conversion.

A member of a Hindoo family who has become a convert to Christianity becomes at once severed from the family, and regarded by them as an out-cast. The tie which bound the family together is, so far as he is concerned, not only loosened, but dissolved. The obligations consequent upon and connected with the tie must be dissolved with it. Upon the conversion of a Hindoo to Christianity the Hindu law ceases to have any continuing obligatory force upon the convert. He may renounce the old law by which he was bound, as he has renounced his old religion, or, if he thinks fit, he may abide by the old law, notwithstanding he has renounced the old religion (237-8). ed according to the Regulation which prescribes that the decision shall be according to equity and good conscience. The course which appears to have been pursued in India in these cases of referring the decision to the usages of the class to which the convert may attach himself, and of the family to which he may have belonged, has been most consonant both to equity and good conscience. The profession of Christianity releases the convert from the trammels of the Hindu law, but it does not of necessity involve any change of the rights or relations of the convert in matters with which Christianity has no concern, such as his rights and interests in, and his powers over, property. The convert, though not bound as to such matters, either by the Hindu law or by any other positive law, may by his course of conduct after his conversion have shown by what law he intended to be governed as to these matters. He may have done so either by attaching himself to a class which as to these matters has adopted and acted upon some particular law, or by having himself observed some family usage or custom ; and nothing can surely be more just than that the rights and interests in his property, and his powers over it, should be governed by the law which he has adopted, or the rules which he has observed (239-40). The intention in both enactments (Regulation VII of 1832, S. 9, and Act XXI of 1850) is perfectly clear; by declaring that the Hindu or Mahomedan law shall not be permitted to deprive any party not belonging to either of those persuasions of a right to property, or that any law or usage which inflicts forfeiture of rights or property by reason of any person renouncing his or her religion, shall not be enforced, the Legislature virtually set aside the provisions of the Hindu law which penalises renunciation of religion or exclusion from caste (101).

Where a Hindu, who with his son formed a joint Hindu family and was entitled in joint tenancy to a moiety of the family properties, abandoned Hinduism and adopted the Mahomedan faith in 1845, held that the effect of the legislation of 1832 and 1850 was that on the father's abandonment of Hinduism the son did not acquire any enforceable right to his father's share in the joint family property which he could either assert himself or transmit to his heirs for enforcement in a British Court of Justice (101). ———Mahomedan descendants of—Succession among—Law governing—Abraham v. Abraham—Decision in—Scope and effect of.

The case has hitherto been treated on the assumption that this family, though converted to Mahomedanism, is to be taken as still conforming to the Hindu laws and usuges ; and that, consequently, the questions of title raised in this cause are to be governed by Hindu law. Their Lordships, however, are far from admitting the correctness of that assumption This case is distinguishable from that of Abraham v. Abraham. There the parties were native Christians, not having, as such, any law of inheritance defined by statute ; and in the absence of one, this committee applied the law by which, as the evidence proved, the particular family intended to be governed. But the written law of India has prescribed broadly that in questions of succession and inheritance the Hindu law is to be applied to Hindus and the Mahomedan law to Mahomedans ; and in the judgment delivered by Lord Kingsdown in Abraham v. Abraham, it is said that " this rule must be understood to refer to Hindoos and Mahomedans, not by birth merely, but by religion also." The two cases in Macnaghten's "Principles of Hindu law," which dealt with the case of converts from the Hindu to the Mahomedan faith, and rule that the heirs according to Hindu law will take all the property which the deceased had at the time of his conversion, are also authorities for the proposition that the devolution of his subsequently acquired property is to be governed by the Mahomedan law. Here there is nothing to show conclusively when or how the property was acquired by " the great ancestor." There was no conflict, as in the cases just referred to, between Hindoos and Mahomedans touching the succession to him. Whatever he had is admitted to have passed to his descendants, of whom all, like himself, were Mahomedans ; and it seems to be contrary to principle that, as between them, the succession should be governed by any but Mahomedan law (537-8). Meaning of.

———Inheritance and succession — Enactments, earlier and later, dealing with matters of—Meaning in—Distinction—Mahomedan—Meaning of, in same.

The framers of the earlier Acts, Regulations and charters (passed to secure to the people of India the maintenance of their ancient law, amongst others in matters of inheritance and succession) had a less detailed acquaintance than we have now with the diversities of creed and of religious law existing in India. They were familiar with two great classes, Mahomedans and Hindus, each with its own law bound up with its own religion. They thought no doubt that they were sufficiently providing for the case of securing to Mahomedans the Mahomedan law, and to Hindus (or Gentus, as they were sometimes called) the Hindu law. In process of time it became more and more clearly understood that there were more forms than one of the Mahomedan law, and more forms than one of the Hindu law, and the Courts, acting in the spirit which prompted the legislation, have applied the law of each school to the people whose ancestral law it was. In the same way it came to be known that there were various religious bodies in India which had, at various periods and under various circumstances, developed out of, or split off from, the Hindu system, but whose members have nevertheless continued to live under Hindu law. Of these the Jainas and the Sikhs are conspicuous examples. Their cases had to be considered by the Courts, and in dealing with them a liberal construction was always placed upon the enactments by which Mahomedans and Hindus were secured in the enjoyment of their own laws (253). ———It was next objected that in matters of diet and ceremonial observance the testator had departed so far from the standard of orthodoxy binding upon him as a Hindu or Sikh as to exclude him from the term Hindu in the Probate and Succession Act.

Their Lordships agree with the Chief Court in thinking that such lapses from orthodox practice could not have the effect of excluding from the category of Hindu in the Act one who was born within it, and who never became otherwise separated from the religious communion in which he was born (257). ———Individual—Community—Distinction.

In the case of a man who is born a Hindu, mere deviation from orthodoxy will not be sufficient to deprive him of Hindu status. He may continue to possess it if he becomes a member of the Brahmo Samaj, and he will not the less possess the status if he has been, say, a Sikh or Jain, or probably if he has even at times worshipped with Buddhists. In the case of a single individual considerable latitude of action is extended before he is deemed to have deprived himself of the religion which gave him his law by anything that does not amount to clear renunciation of that religion. In the instance of a community the question must always be whether there has been continuity of character. No doubt there may develop gradually among a set of people who live and worship together, variations from the regular practices of those who are Hindus which, though considerable, ought not to be taken to be such as have destroyed continuity of relationship (562).

The formation of new castes is a process which is constantly taking place. Usage has modified old principles and it governs in the sects which have adopted such usage. Contact with other religions may well have evolved sects which have discarded many characteristics of orthodox Hinduism, and have adopted ideas and rites which are popularly supposed to belong to other systems. Continuity may not in such cases have been destroyed ; but there is a limit to such processes. Continuity may be so broken that the new sect is outside the original pale. The Hindu law which the Courts administer rests on the shastras, which claim divine sanction and are followed by Brahmins generally. There may have been introduced usages which constitute a departure from the principles of the shastras so great that the community which has adopted them must be taken to have lost the character of being one in which Hindu religion governs. In the case of a sect at a distance from Hindu centres, where the surroundings are Burman and Buddhist and the mode of life is different from that of the Hindu communities in India proper, popularly known as such, it is easier to determine it as being outside Hinduism than it is in the case of an isolated individual who has merely lapsed into unorthodox practices. It is obvious that few influences can be more potent in producing new communities of this separate kind than the combined operation of migration, intermarriage and new occupations. When these influences have operated for sufficiently long a different community. with its peculiar religion and usages, may well result and be so outside Hinduism in the proper meaning of the word. To the members of such a community the expression Hindu in the Indian Succession Act and the Burma Laws Act would not be applicable (562-3).

The application of any merely abstract principle may be insufficient to solve the problem in concrete cases. A method which takes account of historical as well as other considerations must be applied, and the subject-matter must in each instance be looked at as a whole (563 4). In the Ramnad case, the Privy Council observed "The duty, therefore, of a European judge who is under the obligation to administer Hindu law is not so much to inquire whether a disputed doctrine is fairly deducible from the earliest authorities, as whether it has been received by the particular school which governs the district with which he has to deal, and has there been sanctioned by usage. For under the Hindu system of law clear proof of usage will outweigh the written text of the law."

Held : the above passage gives no countenance to the conclusion that in order to bring a case under any rule of law laid down by recognised authority for Hindus generally, evidence must be given of actual events to show that in point of fact the people subject to that general law regulate their lives by it.

Special customs may be pleaded by way of exception which it is proper to prove by evidence of what is actually done. But to put one who asserts a rule of law under the necessity of proving that in point of fact the community living under the system of which it forms part is acting upon it, or defeat him by assertions that it has not been universally accepted or acted upon, would go far to deny the existence of any general Hindu law, and to disregard the broad foundations which are common to all schools, though divergencies have grown out of them. To do so would be to invert the processes by which law is ascertained. (Lord Hobhouse). BHAGWAN SINGH v. BHAGWAN SINGH.

The question is not so much whether an admitted principle of Hindu law shall be carried out to its apparently logical consequences, as what are the limits of an exceptional doctrine established by modern jurisprudence. (195.)

The above observation was made to meet the argument that, the decisions having recognised the right of a coparcener to dispose of his undivided share by gift or other voluntary conveyance without the consent of his co-sharers, it followed as a necessary consequence that he had also the right to dispose of such share by will. Their Lordships observed that the former right was an exceptional doctrine established by modern jurisprudence and that they were not disposed to extend the doctrine of the alienability by a coparcener of his undivided share without the consent of his co-sharers beyond the decided cases. DATTAKA CHANDRIKA AND DATTAKA MIMAMSA.

———Date and authorship of.

It is not known who was the author of the Dattaka Chandrika, and the doubt as to its authorship makes it impossible to fix with any certainty the date when it was written, but it is believed to be an earlier work than the Dattaka Mimamsa, which was written by Nanda Pandita, who is known to have lived about 300 years ago. When the Dattaka Chandrika was first accepted in southern India as an authority on the law of adoption, it would probably be impossible now to ascertain (292). ———Dattaka Chandrika and Dattaka Mimamsa—Authority of.

The Chief Justice denies that the Dattaka Chandrika and the Dattaka Mimamsa have been recognised as any authority at all in the Benares School of Law. But their authority has been affirmed as part of the general Hindu law, founded on the smritis as the source from whence all schools of Hindu law derive their precepts. Both works have been received in courts of law, including this Board, as high authority. Both works must be accepted as bearing high authority for so long a time that they have become embedded in the general law. ------Dattaka Chandrika and Dattaka Mimamsa Date of—Authority of—Questioning of—Permissibility.

The Dattaka Mimamsa is not older than the 17th century A. D., and does not claim any but human origin. It was written during Mahomedan rule and cannot be the work of a law giver or judge.

The date of the Dattaka Chandrika is not certain ; but it is at all events very much later than the Smritis, and it stands only on the footing of a work by a learned man.

Both works have had a high place in the estimation of Hindu lawyers in all parts of India, and having had the advantage of being translated into English at a comparatively early period, have increased their authority during the British rule. Their Lordships cannot concur in the view that their authority is open to examination, explanation, criticism, adoption, or rejection like any scientific treatises on European jurisprudence. Such treatment would not allow for the effect which long acceptance of written opinions has upon social customs, and it would probably disturb recognised law and settled arrangements. But, their Lordships agree that caution is required in accepting their glosses where they deviate from or add to the Smritis. ———Moral and legal obligations—Recommendations and prohibitions—Distinction between—Regard for—Necessity.

All these old text-books and commentaries are apt to mingle religious and moral considerations, not being positive laws with rules intended for positive laws. In the preface to his valuable work on Hindu law Sir William Macnaghten says:—"It by no means follows that because an act has been prohibited it should therefore be considered as illegal. The distinction between the Vinculum juris and the Vinculum pudons is not always discernible." (69.) Great caution is necessary in interpreting books of mixed religion, morality and law (like the Smritis), lest foreign lawyers, accustomed to treat as laws what they find in authoritative books and to administer a fixed legal system, should too hastily take for strict law precepts which are meant to appeal to the moral sense, and should thus fetter individual judgments in private affairs, should introduce restrictions into Hindu society, and impart to it an inflexible rigidity never contemplated by the original law-givers. HINDU LAW—(Contd.)

——No system of law makes the province of legal obligation co-extensive with that of religious or moral obligation. A man may, in his conduct or in the disposition of his property, disregard the plainest dictates of duty. He may prefer an unworthy stranger to those who have the strongest natural claims upon him. He may be ungrateful, selfish, cruel, treacherous to those who have confided in him and whose affection for him ruined them, And yet he may be within his legal rights. The Hindu sages doubtless saw this distinction as clearly as we do and the precepts they have given for the guidance of life must be construed with reference to it. If a transaction is declared to be null and void in law, whether on a religious ground or another, it is so; and if its nullity is a necessary implication from a condemnation of it, the law must be so declared. But the mere fact that a transaction is condemned in books like the Smritis does not necessarily prove it to be void. It raises the question what kind of condemnation is meant. If the authoritative precepts are evenly balanced between the two constructions (the construction according to which an adoption will be void and the construction according to which it will be valid, though reprehensible) the decision should be in favour of that which does not annul transactions acceptable to multitudes of families, and which allows individual freedom of choice. But it is entirely opposed to the spirit of the Hindu customs to allow the words of the law to control its long received interpretation, as practically exhibited by rules of descent and rules of property founded on the decisions of the courts of the country, and it seems to their Lordships that it would be extremely mischievous to distrub upon points taken here for the first time any such course of decision (196). The Mithakshara consists of two books; the first called the Acharadhyaya "On Established Rules of conduct or Ordinances;" the second the Vyavaharadhyaya "On the Laws and Customs of the People." It is to be noted that in the Vyavastha Chandrika the book on "Established Rules of conduct" is cited as the Achara Adhyaya ("Chapter or Book on Established Rules of conduct"), whilst in the decisions of the Indian courts and recent works on Hindu law it is referred to under the name of the Achara-Kanda ("Division or Part relating to Established Rules of conduct"). The Mithakshara of Vijnaneswara, who flourished about the end of the eleventh and the beginning of the twelfth century of the Christian era, purports to be a commentary on the Institutes of Yagnavalkya. Vijnaneswara analyses and discusses the text of his great predecessor, often at considerable length, explains the meaning of recondite passages, supplies omissions, and reconciles discrepancies by frequent reference to other old expounders of the law (214). The logical acumen of this great legist judging from his work seems to have been remarkable (220). In the Bombay Presidency also the doctrines of the Mithakshara are recognised subject to the interpretation of the Vyavahara Mayukha of Nilakanta Bhatta; but on many points there is considerable divergence between the Benares and the Maharashtra schools (225-6). PUNDITS—OPINIONS OF.

———Irreconcilability apparent of, with works of current and established authority—Explanation for—Duty of court to obtain.

When the opinion given by the Pundits on a question referred to them in a suit is apparently irreconcilable with the opinions of proved text-writers, those who give the opinion should be asked to explain that which appears prima facie, thus irreconcilable, so that they may show on what they ground an apparent exception from the general law, whether on general custom modifying texts, on local usage, family customs, or other exceptional matter (422). ———As regards the opinion of the Pundits, their Lordships can but repeat an observation made by them in 8 M. I. A. 400 at 422, to the following effect. Where an opinion apparently discordant from works of current and established authority is delivered by Pundits, it must not be taken on their authority to be a correct exposition of the law. They should be questioned further as to authorities, usage, and generally-received opinions. Such an inquiry might produce a conviction that the Pundits on a new case delivered rather their own notions of expedient law, as law, than delivered it on the force of the opinions of any writers or authoritative expounders of the Hindu law (552-3). ———Mode of taking—Special circumstances bearing upon question submitted—Statement of—Necessity.

The question submitted to the Law Officers (Pundits) does not include some important facts which existed in this case. Every such reference in a suit, where it may bind a right, should embrace all important facts admitted or proved in the cause, which may affect the conclusion ; and it is the duty of the court itself so to frame the questions that they may elicit an opinion upon the very facts upon which the legal title depends. If the facts be not ascertained but stated, and disputed, then the questions should embrace either view of the facts (422). (Lord Kingsdown.) MYNA BOYEE v. OOTARAM. (1861) 8 M.I.A. 400 = 2 W.R. 4 = 2 M.H.C.R. 196 = 1 Suth. 452 = 1 Sar. 797.

The evidence that the doctrine has been sanctioned by usage consists partly of the opinions of Pundits, partly of decided cases. Their Lordships cannot but think that the opinions of the Pundits have been too summarily dealt with by the Judges of the High Court. These opinions, at one time enjoined to be followed, and long directed to be taken by the Courts, were official, and could not be shaken without weakening the foundation of much that is now received as the Hindu law in various parts of British India. Upon such materials the earlier works of European writers on the Hindu law and the earlier decisions of our Courts, were mainly founded. The opinion of a Pundit which is found to be in conflict with the translated works of authority may reasonably be rejected ; but those which are consistent with such works should be accepted as evidence that the doctrine which they embody has not become obsolete, but is still received as part of the customary law of the country. The Mithakshara is no doubt accepted as a high authority by all the schools, even by that of Bengal, when it is not controlled by the Daya-Bhaga, and other treatises peculiar to that school. But the other four schools have, like that of Bengal, though in a less marked degree, their particular treatises and commentaries which control passages of the Mithakshara, and give rise to the differences between those schools. Whilst the Mithila School follows implicitly the Vivada Chintamani and the Ratnacara, the South of India the Smriti Chandrika and the Madhavya ; and the Presidency of Bombay the Vyavahara Mayukha, these works are by no means held in equal estimation at Benares (507-8). Jaimini lays down the rule that all precepts supported by the assignment of a reason are to be taken as recommendations only. The rule is rather starting. It may, however, be fairly argued that one who, having the power to give an absolute command, gives an injunction not expressed in unambiguous terms of absolute command, but resting on a reason, is addressing himself rather to the moral sense of his hearers than to their duty of implicit obedience. ———Origin and development of.

The remoter sources of the Hindu law are common to all the different schools. The process by which those schools have been developed seems to have been of this kind. Works universally or very generally received became the subject of subsequent commentaries. The commentator put his own gloss on the ancient text ; and his authority having been received in one an l rejected in another part of India, schools with conflicting doctrines arose. Thus the Mitakshara, which is universally accepted by all the schools except that of Bengal as of the highest authority, and which in Bengal is received also as of high authority, yielding only to the Dayabhaga in those points where they differ, was a commentary on the Institutes of Yajnavalkya ; and the Dayabhaga, which wherever it differs from the Mithakshara, prevails in Bengal, and is the foundation of the principal divergences between that and the other schools, equally admits and relies on the authority of Yajnavalkya. In like manner there are glosses and commentaries upon the Mitakshara, which are received by some of the schools that acknowledge the supreme authority of that treatise, but are not received by all. This very point of the widow's right to adopt is an instance of the process in question (435). (Sir James W. Colvile.) COLLECTOR OF MADURA v. MOOTTOO RAMALINGA SETHUPATHY

Quaere whether, in a case in which the previous consent of the adopted son of a Hindu would be necessary to render binding upon him (the adopted son) an allotment by the father of family property to a stranger, a subsequent ratification by the son of the allotment would be equivalent for that purpose, in Hindoo Law, to previous consent (103). ———Allotment of family property to stranger—Ratification of—Binding nature of—Knowledge of rights—Ratification without—Effect.

V, a Hindu, first adopted J, and, during the lifetime of J, afterwards adopted R. The adoption of R was found to be invalid under the Hindu law, and it was held that R could not succeed to the estate of V as such adopted son. V had, during his lifetime, however, divided his properties, ancestral and self-acquired, between J and R, and R was in possession of the properties allotted to him under the said division. The question arose whether R's title to the said properties could not be maintained on the ground that it was subsequently recognised by J, and that such subsequent recognition might be considered equivalent to a previous assent. The recognition was based on the fact that J, after he came of age, acquiesced in the division of property made by V.

Held, that it was impossible to maintain R's right upon the ground suggested, because, supposing J to have acquiesced after he came of age in the division of property made by V, it was an acquiescence on the footing of a right already asserted by the father to exist in R, and it did not appear that J possessed all the knowledge, or was placed in the circumstances which must exist in order to make his ratification binding, even if it was assumed, which was not by any means clear, that such subsequent ratification would be equivalent for that purpose, in Hindu law, to previous consent (103). The plaintiff-appellant was the nephew by birth and the son by adoption of the defendant and cross-appellant. The said transactions were evidenced by Exs. C 6, 7, 8 and 9 in the suit, the terms of which are set out on pp. 218-220 of the report of the case in L. R. 8 I. A.

Held that, according to the true construction of Exs. C 6, 7, 8 and 9, all the share and interest in the moveable and immoveable property of M, the natural father of the plaintiff, and in the talook of K, which was thereby stated ———Property of—Suit for, against undivided brother of deceased placed in possession by Government on death of deceased—Mesne profits in—Period for which adopted son entitled to—Adoption by widow—No demand of possession prior to suit.

The then holder of the impartible Zemindary of Chinnakimidy died on 23—11—1868. The appellant was his undivided half-brother; while the respondent was a person who, on 20—11—1870, had been adopted to the deceased by his widow.

On the death of the last holder the Government, in the exercise of its supposed power of nominating a successor, recognised the appellant as the successor to the estate, and placed him in possession of the estate in about September, 1869.

On 15—12—1870, the respondent commenced the suit out of which the appeal arose for the recovery from the appellant of the zemindary and of all the property appurtenant thereto, with mesne profits. The plaint stated that the cause of action accrued to the plaintiff on 20—11—1870, the date of his adoption. The plaint itself was filed on 15—12—1870, and there was no proof of a previous demand of possession.

The High Court nevertheless, by its decree, made the appellant accountable for mesne profits from the time when he was placed in possession by the order of Government in about September, 1869.

Held, modifying the High Court's decree, that the account of mesne profits should run only from the commencement of the suit (193 4).

At the time when the appellant was placed in possession by the order of Government, he was, in default of a son of the last holder, natural or adopted, unquestionably entitled to the zemindary, and there is no proof of a demand of possession before suit (193). When a disposition is made intra vires by one who has full power over property under which a portion of that property is carried away, no rights of a son who is subsequently adopted can affect that portion which is disposed of. The same is true when the disposition is by will and the adoption is subsequently made by a widow who has been given power to adopt. For the will speaks as at the death of the testator, and the property is carried away before the adoption takes place. Held, that there was nothing in the agreement about the Rajah not exercising any power which he might have by law of making a will.

———Will depriving adopted son of property—Contract by adoptive father not to make—Implication of, from fact of adoption itself—Propriety.

The argument that on the adoption of a son by a Hindu there is an implied contract by him not to make a will, the consideration for it being the giving of the son by the natural father, is a novel one and without any authority to support it. If it were right, an adopted son would be in a higher position than a natural son. A Hindu would be unable to adopt a son without depriving himself of any power which he might have by law of alienating his property, or at least of disposing of it by will. ———Will postponing right of adopted son till after death of widow and making gift over in event of his death without issue before—Validity—Dayabhaga law—Widow constituted executrix.

A Hindu, subject to the Dayabhaga school, executed a will by which he appointed his wife his sole executrix and authorised her to adopt Dattaka putra. The will provided, "In case of death of an adopted son my said wife shall adopt one after another five sons in succession. If my said wife dies without adopting a son, or if such adopted son predeceases her without leaving any male issue, in such case my estate after the death of my said wife shall pass to the sons of my sister B who may be living at the time of my death."

On the testator's death his widow applied for and obtained probate of the will. She adopted a son who died without issue and herself died shortly after without making a further adoption. Both the Courts in India held, on the construction of the will, that, as the adopted son died without leaving male issue, on the death of the widow the bequest to the sons of B took effect.

On appeal to the Privy Council, it was urged that on the adoption of the infant the estate vested in him as full owner by virtue of the Hindu law of inheritance, that he took it in his capacity of son and not as devisee under the will, and on his death the property devolved on his heirs, and the executory devise in favour of the sons of B failed.

Held that, on the right construction of the will the estate vested in the widow during her life, that it could pass only to the son who survived her, or in case of his death in her lifetime, to his male issue, if he left any, and that in the events that had happened the gift over took effect (18).

Had the testator given to the widow a power to adopt without constituting her his executrix, she would have taken merely a widow's interest which would have become divested on her adopting a son (17-8). (Mr. Ameer Ali.) BHUPENDRA KRISHNA GHOSE v. AMARENDRA NATH DEY.

Suit No. 316 was brought on behalf of B, a minor, by his natural father, as his next friend, for a declaration that he was the validly adopted son of one K, having been adopted by the appellant, K's widow, under an authority to adopt executed by him in her favour. One of the defendants in the suit was a daughter-in-law of K, who had herself adopted one G under an authority to adopt alleged to have been given to her by her husband. Pending the suit the daughter-in-law died, and G was admitted as a defendant on the record. One of the issues in the case was as to the execution of the authority to adopt relied upon in the plaint. It was contended that the daughter-in-law had by her answer admitted the validity of that instrument and that it was therefore unnecessary for the plaintiff to prove it.

Held that, assuming that there was such an admission by the daughter-in-law, G would not be bound by it (301).

G did not come in as the heir of the daughter-in-law, for, if he were truly adopted, his title was paramount to hers (301). (Lord Kingsdown.) MUSSUMAT ANUNDMOYEE CHOWDHOORAYAN v. SHEEB CHUNDER ROY.

ly adopted son of R, and the daughter of R (until her marriage) should live. The respondent, who was employed at Lahore, allowed the ladies to live in that house. The rents of the property were trifling, and he allowed the ladies to enjoy those rents for their maintenance.

DE FACTO, BUT INVALID, ADOPTION.

———Effect of, on personal and legal status of adopted son.

It is no slight matter for a boy to be passed from one family into another. Even in England such a thing cannot be done without a serious effect, for good or ill, on the boy's welfare. In India the ties of family life are far stricter, and if a boy has been transplanted from his own family into another by a de facto adoption, and then the adoption turns out to be invalid in law, and he is rejected out of his adopted family, his relations to his natural family must be seriously disturbed. Whether his previously existing legal status would be taken away is a point not calling for any opinion. Assuming that the invalidly adopted boy could return after an absence of five years, and so resume his legal position, it is impossible that his personal position should be the same as if the tie to his family had never been broken (129). a son, I declare that I have adopted K, third son of my eldest brother. My wives shall perform the ceremonies according to the shastras, and bring him up, and until that adopted son comes of age, those executors shall look after and superintend all the property, moveable and immoveable, in my own name or benami, left by me, also that adopted son. When he comes to maturity the executors shall make over everything to him to his satisfaction. The executors are empowered to perform the daily and occasional family ceremonies and pay the expenses of suits, etc., after due consideration. The minor, when he attains maturity, shall be incompetent to object to anything done by them in this respect. God forbid, but should this adopted son die, and my younger brother N have more than one son, then my wives shall adopt a son of his. If at that time, N has not a son eligible to adoption, they shall adopt another son of my eldest brother, and the wives and executors shall perform all the afore-mentioned acts."

Held that, on the true construction of the will, there was a gift of his property by the testator to a designated person, K, and that the taking of the property by K under the will was not dependent on whether the testator's wives chose or did not choose to perform the ceremonies (257-8).

The effect of the will according to their Lordships' view is this :—"I declare that I give my property to K, whom I have adopted." There is a gift of his property by the testator to a designated person. This direction follows, "my wives shall perform the ceremonies according to the shastras, and bring him up." Undoubtedly the testator desired and expected that the wives should perform certain ceremonies. He requested them to do so. But it appears to their Lordships that it would be an altogether erroneous reading of the will to suppose that he intended the taking of his property by K to be entirely dependent on whether the wives chose or did not choose to perform the ceremonies. Even if they did not, and the adoption was not in all respects complete, the gift of the property nevertheless took effect (257-8). (*Sir Robert P. ———The portion of the will of a Hindu which contained the bequest to A was as follows :—

"Having no son, I loved and supported A as my son. And as the said boy was very attached to me and my wife, and was an object of affection to us, I had a mind, granting to my daughters and daughters' sons a proper portion of my share of the ancestral property and self-acquired property, to give the remainder of the moveable and immoveable property to the said boy. Since then I have taken the said boy in adoption, in virtue of the consent and gift of his father and mother, after getting the vyavasthas (opinions) of pundits, and on performing the ceremony of jag according to the shastras. Therefore, the said dear boy A will be the heir to the whole of moveable and immoveable property. But I direct that, excepting the property granted by me as stated in paragraph 11 of this will, the said A, and after him his son, and after him his grandson, and on the death of the latter, his great grandson shall obtain the proper share, ancestral, of my father, and the four annas share out of the proper share of my uncle, obtained by me by gift under his will, and the self-acquired moveable and immoveable property of me and my father which will be left. If, through my misfortune, the said boy die without leaving a son, then I give permission to my wife that she may, for the purpose of providing for the preservation of funeral cakes and libations, take in adoption two sons in succession, one on the death of the other, from one of my paternal cousins who may have sons." And there was a direction that if no son could be had of his paternal cousins all his daughter's sons should be in equal shares entitled to his paternal and self-acquired property.

Though the testator went through the ceremonies of adopting A, the adoption was found to be invalid, because there was no giving and taking as required by the law. The question was whether nevertheless A took under the will.

Held, affirming the Courts below, that the bequest was to A by name, and was not dependent upon the adoption, and that A took under the will notwithstanding the invalidity of his adoption (107). (Sir Richard Couch.) BIRESWAR MOOKERJI v. ARDHA CHUNDER ROY CHOWDHRY.

———Where the will of a Hindu stated that he had been keeping the minor son of his brother-in law as adopted son and gave the testator's properties to him absolutely, held that, on the true construction of the will, there was a valid gift to the minor as persona designata and that the validity of the gift was not conditional upon his adoption as a son to the testator having been validly effected.

The testator no doubt refers to the minor as his adopted son, but he explains what is meant by that expression by stating that he had been keeping the minor "as adopted son"—that is, with a view to his adoption. The gift to the minor is therefore not conditional on adoption. (Lord Macnaghten.) SUBBARAYAR v. SUBBAMMAL.

An angikar-patra, addressed to J. ran as follows :—

"To D. This angikar-patra, executed in the year 1284 (1877) by Jogendra Deb Raikat, zemindar of Pergunnah Baikuntpore, etc., showeth,—

"That your father in his lifetime and in the presence of his agnatic relations, gave you away to me for adoption both verbally and under a written deed. I accepted the gift, and duly received the son (in adoption); but I have not hitherto made this fact known to any person in the hope that a son may be born to me of my loins. I have in the meantime supported you and educated you. Besides, to provide against the contingency of my dying without leaving behind me any son born of my loins or taken by me in adoption, I, on Cheyt 1278 (9th April, 1872), executed a will with permission for adoption, wherein I authorised my three wives to take sons in adoption, each of these Ranis to exercise this right on the death of the other. Subsequently on 10th Falgoon, 1279 (20th of February, 1873), I executed a codicil to that will, and in that codicil I appointed the Ranis as principal executors, and I appointed other men assistant executors to assist the Ranis in the management and protection of the estate during the minority of any son who might be born to me or of any son who may be received in adoption either by me or by the Ranis. At present I am suffering from many diseases, and to this day no son has been born to me of my loins. The body is frail; who can say what (ill) (which God forbid) may befall me. Wherefore I have thought it proper to disclose the fact of my having taken a son in adoption, and accordingly I have received you in adoption this day publicly, agreeably to the gift made by your father, and I made you over to your sister by your former step-mother. I authorise you by this angikar-patra to offer oblations of water and pinda to me and my ancestors after my death by virtue of your being my adopted son. Moreover you shall become the proprietor of all the moveable and immoveable properties which I own and which I may leave behind; you shall become entitled to my dena-pawana (debts and dues), and you and your sons and grandsons shall enjoy and own them agreeably to the custom of the family. During your lifetime, and as long as son or grandson of yours is alive, the Ranis shall not be able to take any other son in adoption under the term of the will. But should you die leaving behind you neither a son begotten of your loins nor an adopted son, and without leaving a permission for adoption (which God forbid), in that case the Ranis may take a son in adoption under the terms of the will, and shall thereby protect the estate."

According to the custom of the family J could not adopt a son who would be entitled to inherit the estate. The question, therefore, was whether D was entitled to take J's estate under the terms of the angikar-patra, irrespective of the validity of his adoption.

Held, that D was not so entitled, the intention of J, on the true construction of the angikar-patra, being to give his property to D as his adopted son, capable of inheriting by virtue of the adoption (90) (Sir Richard Couch.) FARINDRA DEB RAIKAT v. RAJESWAR DASS.

———A Hindu, being at the point of death, made his will in the following terms :—

"I am now ill. God forbid it, but if any mishap occur therefrom, and from fear thereof, I do while of sound mind dedicate and give to Annapoorna Thakooranee, the Thakur established by my deceased father, all the ancestral and self-acquired moveable and immoveable properties, zemindaries, and putnee, etc., whether as my own name or benamee, to which I am entitled and of which I am in possession. I have no sons or daughters of my loins. I have two wives living. Each of the two Ranees will adopt one son. The two adopted sons of both wives shall remain the shebaits of the whole of the moveable and immoveable property dedicated to Annapoorna Thakooranee aforesaid. They will carry out the supervision and the improvement of the said property. But they will do everything according to the advice of all the principal officers appointed by me. They will not be competent to make gift or sale of the different properties. Up to the time that the said two adopted sons do not attain their majority, my aforesaid two wives will exercise the care and control of all the said properties, and in carrying out these duties they shall take the advice of all the principal officers which have been appointed by me. They will not be competent to act otherwise. When the two adopted sons shall have attained their majority, and shall have acquired sufficient knowledge for the preservation of the property, my two wives shall make over to them as shebaits, to their satisfaction, all the property dedicated to the Issur Deb Sheba. Out of the income of the property dedicated to the Deb Sheba, etc., after performing the Sheba of the above-mentioned Annapoorna Thakooranee, and the Sree Sree Issurs established by my ancestors and myself, and after meeting the prescribed monthly allowances, and after performing the daily and fixed rites and ceremonies, as they are now performed and met, out of the profits which shall remain, each adopted son shall receive at the rate of 1,000 rupees monthly. Therefore I execute this instrument of will."

After the testator's death, each of the widows adopted a son. The adoptions being simultaneous and therefore invalid under the Hindu law, the adopted sons could not take anything under the will as such. The question was whether they were sufficiently described to enable them to take as persona designata.

Held, that they did not take as personae designata (126).

There is no gift to the adopted sons except in the character of shebaits. And it would require very strong and clear expressions indeed to show that a Hindu gentleman contemplated introducing as shebaits of his family Thakoor, two persons unknown to himself and strangers to his family. There is not a trace in this will to shew any such intention, or to shew that the testator doubted the legality of his scheme, or thought of any adoption but a legal one (126). ———By the first 27 clauses of his will a Hindu gave a great number of legacies and directions about his property. Clause 28 of the will was as follows :—

"28. There is my nephew's son Karamsi now (living). It is my wish to adopt him as my son. If I should not be able to do so in my lifetime, then my son's widow L, is to take the said Karamsi in adoption. His adoption ceremony (Dattvidhan) is to be performed. My property which may remain as residue after all the things mentioned in my will have been done I give to this lad as (his) inheritance. And (I) appoint (him) as my heir. L is to get him betrothed (the outlays being made) out of my property. For the same about Rs. 5,000 are to be spent."

By clauses 29 and 30 of the will the testator directed that after Karamsi was adopted he should take the name of Kessowji, and provided for the costs of his marriage and for his residence, which till he was 18 was to be with L. By clause 31 he directed his executors to make over the property to Karamsi on his attaining 21, if his conduct was good, with alternative provisions if his conduct was bad, in favour of a well-behaved son. Clause 46 provided for the contingency of the death of Karamsi after adoption without leaving any descendants. The clause provided that in that event another boy should be adopted.

L refused to adopt Karamsi. On a question arising thereupon whether the bequest to him was to take effect only upon the condition that the adoption should have taken place or was a legacy validly made in his favour, as a person designated, without the adoption having been carried out, held, that the adoption was a condition precedent, and that the boy not having been adopted could not take under the will. ———A wajib-ul-arz, recorded under Act XIX of 1873 and relating to a village called D, contained, under the head of "Inheritance, second marriage, and adoption," the following statement :—

"I am the only Zemindar in this Village. I am a Marwari Brahmin. Seven years ago, I adopted my sister's son M. He is my heir and will be the owner. If, after this agreement, a son is born to me, half the property will be received by him and half by the adopted son. If more than one son are born to me, the property will be equally divided among them, including the adopted son, as brothers. I have two wives now. They will receive their maintenance from him (M) during their lifetime."

This statement was signed by Dhanraj, the owner of the village D.

Held that, assuming that the statement could be treated as a will in favour of the adopted son M, it was the intention of Dhanraj to give his property to M as his adopted son capable of inheriting by virtue of the adoption ; and that as the adoption was invalid, it gave M no right to inherit, and the gift therefore had no effect upon the property.

The point to be considered is whether it was the intention of Dhanraj to make the boy whom he had adopted his heir irrespective of adoption, or whether "the assumed fact of his adoption was not the reason and motive of the gift, and indeed a condition of it." The distinction between what is descriptive only, and what is the reason or motive of a gift or bequest, may often be very fine, but it is a distinction which must be drawn from a consideration of the language and the surrounding circumstances.

In the present case the words used are descriptive only. The right of M to inherit is based entirely on the fact that he was an adopted son, adopted seven years previously in virtue of a special custom which is thus stated : "A sharer shall be at liberty to adopt his sister's son or brother's son or daughter's son, whomsoever he may like, and after his death his adopted son will inherit his property." The words in the wajib-ul-arz, "If, after this agreement, a son is born to me, half the property will be received by him, and half by the adopted son" indicate that the gift is not a gift to M personally, but a division of the estate according to the family custom which Dhanraj was endeavouring to establish, and according to which the adopted son was to take an equal share with natural-born sons. The suit was to recover from the respondent one half of the estate which had belonged to one R, and was instituted by the appellant as mother and guardian of her adopted son J. R had died childless, leaving a widow C. The respondent was the only son of a brother of R. The appellant was the widow of another brother of R. That other brother died during the lifetime of C, having given the appellant power to adopt a son. The appellant adopted J in pursuance of that authority after the death of C. It further appeared that J was not even in existence at that time, and was born only subsequently. The appellant alleged that, in consequence of the respondent's fraud in setting up a forged will, the appellant was unable to get any one to give her a son in adoption, and could not adopt until after the death of C. She, therefore, contended that, but for the fraud and forgery of the respondent, she would have adopted a boy during the lifetime of C, who would have been entitled to half of the estate of R.

Held that, as J was not even existence at the time of C's death, he could not, even apart from the fraud of the respondent, have taken R's estate. (Sir Barnes Peacock.) BHUBANESWARI DEBI v. NILKOMUL LAHIRI.

———Collateral succession—Right of—Gotra of adoptive father—Relatives of adoptive father not of—Right if extends to.

The question was whether G, an adopted son, was entitled to succeed to the estate of B. G was the adopted son of K, the maternal grandfather of B, and was not of the same gotra as B, whose gotra was that of his father. It was contended that, although G as an adopted son might inherit collaterally, it must be in the same gotra, and consequently he was not heir to B.

Held, affirming the High Court, that G was heir to B (246).

The limitation of the right of an adopted son to succeed to his collateral relations now contended for is contrary to the whole theory of the Hindu law of adoption. No text has been produced to shew that an adopted son cannot succeed to the estate of such relatives of his father as are sprung from a different family (246). ———Maternal uncle by adoption- Succession to -Right of.

The suit was brought by the respondent against the appellant to recover certain property which he claimed as an adopted son.

The former full owner of the property was K, who died in 1815, leaving a widow, B, and a son, who died in the following year unmarried, and a daughter H, who was married to J S, and died in April, 1872. B died on 1st December 1873, and the respondent claimed to be entitled to the property on her death, as having been adopted by H, with the permission of her husband, who died in 1843. M, the original defendant, was the nephew of K, and took possession of the property on the death of B. The appellants were the sons of M. The question for decision was whether the respondent, as an adopted son, could succeed to the property in suit.

Held, affirming the High Court, that the respondent was entitled to succeed as being the daughter's son, and consequently the heir of his maternal uncle at the death of the widow, which he would be if he were a natural-born son (149).

That this is so is clear from the Dattaka Mimamsa, S. 6, p. 50, where it is said: "The forefathers of the adoptive mother only are also the maternal grand-sires of sons given and the rest, for the rule regarding paternal is equally applicable to maternal grand sires (of adopted sons)" (149). HINDU LAW—(Contd.)

Adoption—Adopted son—(Contd.)

———Adoption has been spoken of as "new birth" in many cases, a term sanctioned by the theory of Hindu law. Nor is the expression a mere figure of speech. The theory itself involves the principle "of a complete severance of the child adopted from the family in which he is born .... and complete substitution into the adoptive family, as if he were born in it." "The fundamental idea is that the boy given in adoption gives up the natural family and everything connected with the family." The expressions "Civilly dead or as if he had never been born in the family" are not for all purposes correct or logically applicable, but they are complimentary to the term "new birth." It is not merely the ceremonies for the natural father, who has given, or for the adoptive father, who has taken, a son in adoption that are involved, but those for the ritual number of ancestors in each case. "Let no man give or accept an only son, since he must remain to raise up a progeny for the obsequies of ancestors. He who means to adopt a son,.....may receive as his son by adoption, even one more remotely related.....The class ought to be known, for through one son the adopter rescues many ancestors." Consideration of the intimate connection, which primitive Hindu laws established between the funeral offerings and ceremonies on behalf of the dead and the right of succession to his property, will show that ceremonially the adopted son only becomes new-born in the family of his adoptive father, so as to be qualified to provide efficaciously the offerings of which the dead have need, by first dying in the family of his birth, out of which he is given by his natural to his adoptive parent, and in which his offerings will be no longer efficacious or desired. In 1876 a sonless Bengali Zemindar adopted a son under a registered agreement which provided as follows: "From this day the aforesaid adopted son has become entitled to all my properties, moveable and immoveable, and to perform the services of the idols and all rites and ceremonies in connection with maternal and paternal ancestors. After my death, he shall perform the services of the deities, and live in my ancestral residence, and being vested with all my rights, and entitled to the ownership of those properties, he shall protect, enjoy and possess them by exercising the rights of sale and gift, and shall maintain all my rites and ceremonies. If a son of my loins is born, both of them shall be equally entitled to all the aforesaid moveable and immoveable properties which may be left by me, and the son born of my loins shall not be entitled to claim a larger share in them, and if he does so it shall be rejected." The immoveable property of the zemindar referred to in the agreement consisted of villages which were his private or secular property, and of debutter villages which were in his possession as shebait.

In 1878 the appellant, a natural-born son, was born to the zemindar. In 1905, the zemindar died leaving private or secular and debutter properties, and a dispute arose between the appellant and the respondents, the sons of the adopted son, who had died during the interval, with regard to the properties.

Held, that upon the true construction of the agreement the respondents were entitled, equally with the appellant, to a half share in the debutter properties as shebaits; and that the High Court had rightly decreed that the period of the shebas might be divided into six monthly or annual palas, as the parties might arrange, with liberty to apply if no arrangement were made. ———Finding on—Effect of, inter partes — Properties in two suits different.

The appellant, claiming to be reversionary heir of V S sued for a declaration that alienations of portions of the property of V S made by his mother (1st defendant) in favour of his sisters (defendants 2 and 3) were invalid and inoperative beyond the life time of the 1st defendant, and that the appellant was entitled as reversionary heir to the portions so alienated. The reversionary character of the plaintiff-appellant depended upon the correctness of his allegation that the father of V S had been adopted by the appellant's father's father.

In a prior suit between the father of the appellant and the father of V S it had, however, been conclusively determined, upon an issue raised in a Court of competent jurisdiction, that the father of V S had not been adopted,

Held, that the appellant's suit was barred by res judicata (21).

Appellant contended that he is not bound by the finding as to adaption in the former suit, because that suit did not relate to the property which is the subject of the present suit,

It is true that the former suit did not relate to the same property as that which is the subject of the present suit; but the issue has been tried and determined by a court of competent jurisdiction whether the father of V S had been adopted by the appellant's father's father. The authorities cited for the appellant do not establish that in order that an estoppel may be binding the two suits must relate to the same subject-matter (18). Their Lordships are clearly of opinion that the issue which was tried in the former suit is the same as that which the plaintiff wished to be tried in this suit, and that the plaintiff is estopped from making the allegation which he attempts now to support (21). On a claim for maintenance or for a 4-annas share in an Oudh taluq brought forward against the taluqdar by the respondent, his brother, the committee of Taluqdars made an award dismissing the claim on the ground that the respondent had been adopted by one B's widow, and had consequently ceased "to have any interest in the heritage of his natural father," and that award was affirmed by the Financial Commissioner.

Held, that the Committee of Taluqdars was not in any sense a Court, much less a Court with jurisdiction to decide the question of adoption within the meaning of S. 13 of C. P. C. of 1882, and that their award was therefore, no bar to the trial of the same issue in a subsequent Civil suit (131).

Held, that if the depositions were genuine they were decisive of the case (515).

In them C, three times deliberately styles the respondent an adopted son. Now, if there were no adoption at all, or if the actual adoption were for any reason legally invalid, the respondent would, of course, not be entitled to that designation. They amount, therefore, to a complete admission of the whole title of the respondent, both in fact and in law, and show that the objections which have been urged to his claim, in the opinion of the appellant's father, who probably was well acquainted with all the circumstances, and may be assumed to have known the Hindu laws and customs, had no foundation (515).

The appellant sued the respondent for a declaration that she had not in fact adopted him as a son to her deceased husband, and that if, in fact, any ceremony of adoption had been performed, it was invalid, owing to the absence of an authority to adopt from her husband to make such adoption. She further prayed that a document purporting to be a deed of adoption should be declared void as being executed by her without such authority as aforesaid.

The evidence showed that the appellant had asserted her authority in the most solemn manner under her hand and seal, and that her conduct both before and after that assertion had been of a like unequivocal character. The respondent was severed from his natural family; he underwent a change of social status which might or might not be beneficial to him, but which certainly so altered his mode of life as to make a relapse into his former condition a grievous hardship upon him. He and his friends were driven to expenses in the maintenance of the privileges with which the appellant purported to endow him. He married on the faith of his adoptive mother's word, and his creditors dealt with him in like reliance on her good faith.

It has been argued that the defendants are estopped from setting up the true facts of the case or even asserting the law in their favour, inasmuch as they have represented in former suits and in various ways, by letters and by their actions, that L (through whom the plaintiff claimed) was the adopted son of D. But there is no estoppel in the case. There has been no misrepresentation by L or the defendant on any matter of fact. They are alleged to have represented that L, was adopted. The plaintiff's case is that L, was in fact adopted. So far as the fact is concerned there is no misrepresentation. It comes to no more than this, that they have arrived at a conclusion that the adoption which is admitted in fact was valid in law, a conclusion which is erroneous; but that creates no estoppel whatever between the parties (133). ———Validity against adopted son of—Basis proper of—Custom—Limits imposed by.

A childless Hindu in possession of ancestral lands and not living joint with any relative made a will by which he disposed of his property roughly in part to the appellant, in part to his widow for life, in part to charity, and in part to the respondents (relatives of the testator, who were in no case within the degrees entitled to maintenance). Under the will, the land which the widow held for life was, after her death, to go in part to the appellant and in part to the respondents. On the same day, the natural father of the appellant, then a minor, executed a deed consenting to the provisions of the will. Immediately thereafter the appellant was adopted by the testator. It was found, in fact, that the will was executed unico contextu with the deed of consent by the natural father of the appellant, and that both were executed in view of the adoption which took place subsequently. It was also admitted that the natural father of the appellant was a poor man and had two other sons at the time, and had two subsequently.

Held that the will, taken along with the deed of consent, was not binding on the appellant so as to cut down what would have been his rights had he been a natural instead of an adopted son.

When the adoption is antecedent to the date at which the disposition is meant to take effect, inasmuch as the rights which flow from adoption are immediate, the disposition if given effect to, is inconsistent with these rights and cannot of itself vi propria affect them. The natural father loses all power over the son from the moment when he is adopted. His consent cannot, therefore, by virtue of any power in himself, take any effect on the rights of the boy which only arise when his rights as a natural father are non-existent He cannot give such consent as guardian of the infant so as to bind him. It is impossible to ascribe any value to the guardianship power of the natural father to bind the son as to property in which he cannot have an interest until the time when the guardianship has ceased. The case cannot be solved by the doctrine of approbate and reprobate, for that doctrine assumes election, and the adopted son has no election. He cannot undo the adoption and be as he was. The same fact destroys the idea of conditional adoption. The adoption cannot be undone; it cannot, therefore, be conditional.

The only ground on which such arrangement can be sanctioned is custom. There is such a consensus of decision in the cases that it may fairly be concluded that custom has sanctioned such arrangements in so far as they regulate the right of the widow as against the adopted son. It seems part of the custom that one sine qua non of such an arrangement should be the consent of the natural father. The consensus of judgments seems to treat the consent of the natural father as showing that the arrangement is for the advantage of the boy, and to regard the mere postponement of his interest to the widow's interest, even though it should be one extending to a life interest in the whole property, as not incompatible with his position as a son. Their Lordships are, therefore, prepared to hold that custom sanctions such arrangements.

As soon, however, as the arrangements go beyond that, i.e., either give the widow property absolutely or give the property to strangers, their Lordships think no custom as to this has been proved to exist and that such arrangements are against the radical view of the Hindu law. Their Lordships are, therefore, against the idea of a general proposition that all arrangements consented to by a natural father, and of benefit to the boy in the sense that half a loaf being better than no bread, he is better with an adoption with truncated rights than with no adoption at all, are valid. An Oudh talukdar authorised his senior widow, to whom he gave a life estate in all his property, to adopt such minor male child of his family as she might think fit. The adopted son was, according to the authority, to "be in place of an actual son the owner of the entire riasat, and the assets, moveable and immoveable," and the widow was, in the event of adoption, to have a provision for her maintenance.

The widow adopted the second defendant. The ceremonies of adoption were duly performed, and a deed of adoption was executed by her, which declared, inter alia, that the second defendant would be the proprietor of the deceased's estate and property both moveable and immoveable like a real son. There was not either in the ceremonial of adoption or in the said deed of adoption any condition limiting or curtailing the rights of the adopted son. It appeared, however, that, prior to the adoption, the widow had obtained from the natural father of the second defendant a deed which declared that she should have full control during her lifetime over the property left by her husband; and she executed a second and subsequent deed of adoption, by which she purported to revoke the prior one on the allegation that it ought to have contained a provision postponing the interest of the adopted son until her death.

Held, that the adoption was not a fraud upon the authority to adopt, and was not void on that ground (58).

The conduct of the widow is not altogether to be commended, but it would be extravagant to describe it as fraudulent, or to maintain that the adoption was made for a corrupt purpose or for a pupose foreign to the real object for which the authority to adopt was conferred. The ceremonies or adoption are unimpeached. The deed of adoption is open to no objection. The second deed is admittedly inoperative. No conditions, therefore, were

The natural father of a minor boy gave him in adoption to a Hindu widow on the understanding that he would inherit only about one-third of his adoptive father's estate. The remaining two-thirds of the said estate had, previously to the adoption, been alienated by the widow in favour of third parties. The natural father consented to give the minor in adoption, being aware of the said alienations or not caring to inquire how the said two-thirds had been disposed of.

The adopted son, two years after coming of age, and his adoptive mother executed an agreement on 19—8—1871, reciting the alienations aforesaid of the two-thirds of the adoptive father's estate, whereby mother and son entered into a family arrangement with respect to the residue. When he executed that agreement the adopted son was sufficiently alive to his rights, and he executed it after consulting members of his wife's family, upon whose advice he acted. Further, in a suit brought about 12 months after the date of the agreement the plaintiff stated that he enjoyed the property of his adoptive father under that agreement.

———Dying man telling his wife then pregnant that she would produce a son, and, if not, she could adopt one if amounts to an.

The question was whether the appellant, a Hindu widow, was really authorised by him to adopt a son to him, in the event of the child with which she was then pregnant being a girl.

The evidence of the alleged authority consisted of witnesses who deposed to hearing the deceased say, by way of consoling his widow, who was deeply distressed at the prospect of his death, that she should not be so much grieved; that she would produce a son, and, if not, she could adopt one.

Their Lordships observed: "Surely this is not the language which would be used by a person who, on the prospect of death, with a view to the salvation of his soul, was at that moment laying injunctions on his widow for the performance of a solemn and important duty" (343). The suit was by the widow of one G to recover possession of property which had formerly belonged to G's nephew. The plaintiffs' case was that the nephew died leaving a widow, but no male issue, that, on the death of the nephew's widow, G. her husband, became entitled to the property of his nephew, and that G had devised the property to her (plaintiff). The defendant claimed to be the adopted son of the nephew, his case being that he had been adopted by the widow of the nephew in pursuance of a verbal authority given by him to her. The plaintiff denied that the nephew had given his widow any authority to adopt.

It appeared that, during G's lifetime, a solehnama or instrument of compromise had been executed between him and his nephew's widow, and that it contained clear admissions on the part of G that his nephew's widow had an authority from her husband to adopt five sons in succession.

Held, that it was impossible for the representative of G, claiming through him, to contend in the face of the solehnamah that the widow of the nephew had no power to adopt (30-1). The question was as to whether there was adequate proof of a custom empowering a widow, who had not the authority of her husband, to adopt a son to him.

The evidence of the alleged custom consisted of statements in the wajib-ul-arzes of eight villages which had been recorded about 44 years before the adoption in question. In the wajib-ul-arz of the village in which the last male owner lived and in some of the other wajib-ul-arzes it was stated that widows could adopt sons to their deceased husbands without having had the authority of their husbands to adopt. In the other wajib-ul arzes it was simply stated that widows could adopt.

Held, that there was no inconsistency between the statements in the different wajib-ul-arzes and that the custom was proved.

The mere statement that the widows could adopt in some of the wajib ul-arzes also means that they could adopt, although they had not the requisite authority. Otherwise the statement would not be a statement of a special family ———Vasishta's text as to—Interpretation of, in different schools.

All the schools accept as authoritative the text of Vasishta, which says :—

' Nor let a woman give or accept a son unless with the assent of her Lord.' But the Mithila school apparently takes this to mean that the assent of the husband must be given at the time of the adoption, and, therefore, that a widow cannot receive a son in adoption, according to the Dattaka form, at all. The Bengal school interprets the text as requiring an express permission given by the husband in his lifetime, but capable of taking effect after his death ; whilst the Mayukha and Koustubha Treatises, which govern the Maratha school, explain the text away by saying that it applies only to an adoption made in the husband's lifetime, and is not to be taken to restrict the widow's power to do that which the general law prescribes as beneficial to her husband's soul. Thus upon a careful review of all these writers, it appears that the difference rather relates to what shall be taken to constitute, in cases of necessity, evidence of authority from the husband, than to the authority to adopt being independent of the husband (435-6). An adoption by a Hindu widow in virtue of an authority to adopt given to her by her deceased husband, of her brother's son is not, according to Hindu law, an invalid adoption (160).

The test of eligibility of the adopted son for adoption in such case must be the test which would have applied had the adoption been made by the husband himself in his lifetime.

The extension by Nanda Pandita in the Dattaka Mimamsa to adoption by females of the rule of Hindu law that no one can be adopted as a son whose mother the adopter could not have legally married, is not supported by any text of the Dattaka Chandrika, or by any of the texts of the sages Saunaka and Sakala from which most of the rules of the Dattaka Mimamsa were deduced (161-2) (Sir John Edge.) PUTTU LAL v. PARBATE KUNWAR.

If he (the boy) cannot be obtained, any other boy should be adopted with the advice of the trustees."

Held that the direction was not merely an appeal to the wife to exercise her discretion in the manner indicated, but imposed upon her a mandate to exercise it.

" Should as far as possible" means that unless there are conditions outside the will preventing the possibility of the adoption, the widow, when she does adopt, is to exercise her power in favor of S.

Subsequent to the death of the testator ill feeling arose between his widow and S and his family, and the widow adopted her sister's son with the consent of the trustees. Held further that the adoption was invalid.

It has been suggested that the ill-feeling between the widow and S and his family prevents the possibility of his adoption, and two clauses in the will are referred to in both of which the testator in strong language directed that the adopted son should keep the widow, treat her with affection, and give her maintenance, which it is said is in the circumstances impossible. Where it is proved that a deceased Hindu had in fact expressed as a direction to be followed by his wife his wish that no boy except the one named by him should at any time be adopted to him, it must be held that the direction prohibited the widow from adopting any other boy than the one named. But such a direction to operate as a prohibition against his widow adopting any boy to him as a son excepting the boy named by him must be explicitly made and clearly intended by the husband to limit the discretion of his widow for all time, and on every occasion on which otherwise after his death his widow might validly make an adoption to him. Such a direction may be given by the husband orally or in writing, as for instance by a will. The duty of a Hindu widow is to obey such directions as her husband may have given as to the way in which she should exercise a power of adoption to him. That is a general principle of Hindu law as to adoptions, and is not applicable only in cases in which the husband and wife were subject to the Bombay School of Hindu law (522). (Sir John Edge). If (God forbid) the son who might be adopted under this authority should die in your lifetime, you will have power to adopt another boy;" held that the authority was a general authority and was not restricted to the adoption of a second boy in case the first adopted son died.

What the deceased Rajah (husband) intended was that, if necessary, "some boy" should be adopted to him "so that he might perform my Sraddh ceremony and yours, and perpetuate my name, and after your death become the absolute owner and possessor of the whole of my estate," but in expressing this intention he saw that it might be defeated by death if construed in a restrictive sense as meaning some "one" boy, so he went on to deal with that contingency by directing, in substance, that effect was, in any event, to be given to the general intention, and if one boy died another boy was to be adopted (147-8). A Hindu by his will authorised his widow to adopt a son if no male or female child should be born to him. He died without issue, but had a posthumous daughter. After the death of the posthumous daughter the testator's widow purported to adopt a son to him. Held that in the events which happened the power of adoption did not arise.

Though there is a strong presumption that a Hindu testator would have desired that in the event of his having no child who survived him and attained maturity, a son should be adopted to him by his widow, and the courts would not be astute to defeat an adoption by the widow which is not clearly in excess of the power conferred upon her, held it was impossible, without unduly straining the words of the will in question, to hold that in the events which happened the power took effect. Where an authority to adopt given to a widow by her husband was couched in general terms, requiring her to adopt so as to continue his line and to provide for his spiritual benefit, did not indicate any particular person for adoption, by name or otherwise, and placed no restriction whatever on her discretion, held that the authority was not exhausted by one adoption, and, that, on the death of the son first adopted, authority survived so as to empower the widow to make a second adoption.

In the present case it is abundantly clear that the husband desired to be represented by a son after his death, and that he placed no specific limitation on the power to adopt, which he entrusted to his widow. His object was twofold—to secure spiritual benefit to himself, and to continue his line. Both these objects are meritorious in the view of the Hindu law, and both are in consonance with the feelings known to prevail throughout the Hindu community. In the absence of a natural son, both can be obtained only by adoption. (Sir Andrew Scoble.) KANNAPALLI SURYANARAYANA v. PUCHA VENKATA RAMANNA.

Held that the will did not give any authority at all to the testator's widow to make an adoption, not even an authority restricted by the consent of the executors and trustees named in the will; that, on the literal construction of the terms of the will, the testator authorised an appointment, not by his wife, but by her and the two others whom he had appointed executors and trustees, and that such an authority to adopt was invalid.

A Hindu, who was admittedly only 19 years age and was under guardianship, executed a document, which purported to be a disposition of his property and at the same time conferred a power of adoption on his widow. The document was registered as a will at the instance of a legatee. The testator being a minor at the date of the execution of the document it was inoperative as a will. The question was whether it was effectual as a valid authority to adopt.

The widow, who, at the time of the registration of the document as a will, was the only one who could present it for registration, did not do so herself and did not give authority for the registration. And she failed to register it within the period of 4 months provided by S. 19 of the Registration Act.

———Evidence against—Proceedings between widow and surviving co-parceners as if there was no such deed—Value of.

One D died leaving a son and a widow, the appellant. That son died subsequently, and many years after his death the appellant purported to make an adoption to D, alleging that he had given her authority to do so by a deed in writing. The question was whether the deed of authority to adopt so set up was genuine.

It appeared that on the death of D's son, his property was claimed by his uncle, the eldest brother of D, and that he instituted a suit against the younger brother and the appellant claiming the property. In that suit the parties came to a compromise, and executed a deed of Solehnamah. It was essential to that compromise that the fact of there not being anybody in existence who could dispute the validity of that agreement should be stated. The deed accordingly stated that D's son who had been in existence was dead. The deed not only had the seal of the appellant attached to it, but was produced in Court. The judge before whom it was produced took steps to satisfy himself that the deed was actually executed with the knowledge of the appellant, and, after being so satisfied, allowed it to be filed in court, and, from that time down to the date of the suit out of which the appeal arose, it remained impeached.

Held that the Solehnamah was a distinct recognition that there was no such instrument as the deed of authority set up (491). (Lord Kingsdown.) CHUNDERMONEE DEBIA CHOUDHOORAYN v. MUNMOHEENEE DEBIA.

The question was as to the genuineness of an anumati-patra alleged to have been executed by the last male owner authorising his widow to adopt a son to him. Held, that the will, if genuine, was a very important document, for it not only supported the evidence as to the anumati-patra, but amounted to an assertion by the last male owner, through whom the plaintiff, who attacked the anumati-patra, claimed, that he had given power to his wife to adopt, which, in the absence of evidence to prove the revocation of the power, would have been sufficient to support the adoption made in pursuance of that power

In a suit brought by a Hindu widow to set aside an adoption alleged to have been made by the widow of her deceased son under an authority alleged to have been given by him, the two questions were (1) as to the execution by the deceased son of the alleged deed of authority and (2) as to the age of the deceased at the time. The daughter-in-law alleged that the deed of authority had been executed by her husband with the concurrence of his mother. There were also prior admissions by the mother-in-law which were inconsistent with the case she attempted to make in the suit.

The object of the suit was to establish an adoption, under a deed, called an anumati-patra, giving authority to adopt. The husband died within 6 months after the date of the alleged deed, and the adoption alleged to have been made in pursuance of it was not completed until 17 years after the death of the husband. The only excuse for the delay was that there was a son then in existence, and that so long as that son lived there was no necessity for the adoption of another son ; but that son died nearly 12 years before the adoption in dispute, and there was no proof whatever, nor even an allegation, of any such power having existed.

Held, affirming the courts below, that the alleged authority to adopt was not genuine. (Lord Kingsdown). CHUNDERMONEE DEBIA CHOWDHOORAYN v. MUNMOHEENEE DEBIA. (1861) 8 M. I. A. 477 = 1 Sar 809.

———The respondent instituted the suit out of which the appeal arose for the recovery from the appellant of the suit zemindary and of all the property appurtenant thereto. The respondent claimed to be the adopted son of the last holder of the estate and to be entitled to the suit property as such adopted son. The respondent's case was that he had been adopted by the widow of the last holder in pursuance of a written authority to adopt executed by the deceased in her favour. And one of the principal questions for decision was whether the alleged written authority was in fact executed by the deceased. The appellant was the undivided brother of the deceased who would have been entitled to the estate and its appurtenances but for the adoption.

Their Lordships, weighing the evidence and the probabilities in favour of the plaintiff's case, against the evidence and the probabilities in favour of the defendant's case, not without doubt or difficulty, came to the conclusion that the former so preponderated over the latter that they ought to pronounce in favour of the alleged deed of authority, as a valid written authority to adopt executed by the decea ed (187-8). A hibanama, or deed of gift, executed by J.S. in favour of H contained a statement that he had executed in her favour a deed of permission to adopt. In the deed by which the first adopted son was given in adoption by his mother to H there was this passage :—"your husband, J.S., being without issue, gave you during his lifetime permission to adopt a son, and has since died." That deed was witnessed by the original defendant, who contested the validity of the respondent's adoption and claimed the suit property as against him. And in his deposition taken in the suit out of which the appeal arose the original defendant admitted that "the respondent was treated and acted as a son to H, calling her mother, and her mother grandmother, and M" (the original defendant himself) 'mama' or meternal uncle, and he answered accordingly."

———No adoption in pursuance of authority alleged.

The plaintiff-appellant was the widow and sole heir-at-law of a deceased Hindu, and claimed to recover all the property, moveable and immoveable, of the deceased in that right. The respondents were trustees under a will and codicil alleged by them to have been executed by the deceased bequeathing his properties, in the main, to certain charities. The appellant denied the genuineness and validity of both instruments. The appellant also alleged in her plaint that her husband had enjoined her, in the event of the child with which she was pregnant, at his death, not proving to be a male, to adopt a son to be chosen by herself, and that matter was also put in issue in the Courts below. But no adoption according to that power was ever suggested in the Courts in India to have been actually made.

ORAL AUTHORITY.

———Evidence of witnesses as to—Ground for discrediting—Written authority set up previously by widow if and when a.

In a case in which the defendant set up the case that the widow of the deceased had a verbal authority to adopt given by the deceased and that she had adopted the defendant in pursuance of such authority, it was strongly argued that the witnesses for the defendant who deposed to the verbal authority ought not to be believed when in conflict with those for the plaintiff, who deposed against the same, because the widow of the deceased had in a prior litigation set up a written authority.

Held that in the circumstances of the case, the argument was not well founded (31).

It may well be that according to the course, unhappily too common, of Hindu litigation, when the widow found that her father-in-law, who was the principal witness, if the story now told is true, to the giving the verbal authority to adopt, had turned round upon her and was seeking to dispossess her by setting up a false case of an adoption by her husband, she may have been advised, and may have been foolish and wicked enough to adopt the advice, to set up a written authority to adopt which really never existed. Her inconsistent conduct would not affect the credit of those witnesses who now speak to the verbal authority to adopt, and to the alleged exercise of it by her. Therefore their Lordships think that this argument ought not to have much weight with them in determining the credit of the witnesses who have sworn to the adoption (31). (*Sir James W. In a case in which the question was whether a deceased Hindu gave his widow authority to adopt, the answer depended on the reliance to be placed, on the testimony of certain witnesses. The trial judge, an Indian, before whom all the witnesses except one had been examined, believed the evidence in favour of the alleged authority to adopt, and rejected the evidence against it. The High Court, on appeal, on the other hand, disbelieved the evidence in support of the alleged authority and accepted the evidence against it.

The alleged authority was a verbal one and was said, to have been given nearly 13 years before the date on which the evidence was taken. 5 witnesses, all of good position, deposed to having been present at the time when the authority was said to have been given. There were some discrepancies of a minor kind in their stories, discrepancies which might well be accounted for by the fact that the conversation which they described took place some thirteen years previously, but none that were important. The probabilities were at least not adverse to their story. The High Court, in disbelieving their story, relied upon the minor discrepancies. They also thought that the fact that one of the witnesses spoke of the authority verbally given as one

Suit No. 316 was brought on behalf of B, a minor, by his natural father as his next friend for a declaration that he was the validly adopted son of one K, having been adopted by the appellant. K's widow, under an authority to adopt executed by him in her favour, one of the defendants in the suit was a daughter-in-law of K, being the widow of a son who died childless after the death of K. The answer of the daughter-in-law denied generally the truth of the plaintiff's case. If it did not directly impugn the authority to adopt relied upon by the plaintiff, it did not in terms admit it. Her defence was no doubt mainly directed to the avoidance of the adoption of B by setting up an adoption made by the daughter-in-law herself; but it did not admit that if the latter adoption failed, B's adoption was necessarily valid.

Held, that the daughter-in-law's answer did not contain an admission which, even as between B, and her, would have dispensed with the necessity of proving the authority to adopt (301). (Lord Kingsdown.) MUSSUMAT ANUNDMOYEE CHOWDHOORAYAN v. SHEEB CHUNDER ROY.

The suit was by the reversionary heir of a deceased Hindu to set aside an adoption made to him by his widow about 42 years before date of suit. The adoption itself was admitted by the plaintiff before the Privy Council and the only question therefore was whether the widow had the authority of her husband to make the adoption.

The adopted son was, from the moment of his adoption, transferred from his natural home to his adopted home and had lived there all his life as a member of that household. On the last male owner's death, the local authorities made the ordinary inquiries as to the necessary entries on the register consequent upon such death, and the widow, the adoptive mother, was entered as guardian of the minor and adopted son. There were litigations of various characters during the course of the long term of years which elapsed after the adoption, and the plaintiff acted along with the adopted son, acknowledging, in the course of the proceedings, his right. The plaintiff did not question the authority to adopt during the widow's life which exceeded for 30 years beyond that of her husband.

Held that, under the circumstances of the case, the burden resting altogether apart from the law of limitation, upon any litigant who challenged the authority of an admitted adoption, was indeed of the heaviest character. In a case in which a Hindu testator had authorised his wife to adopt a son to him with the consent of trustees whom he had appointed under his will, and she had made an adoption with their consent, the trustees were charged with impropriety of conduct in that they failed in their duty of informing her as to her rights. It was contended that the trustees were under a duty to inform the widow that if she failed to adopt. she would herself come into the position of being heiress to her husband's estate. The widow was said to have been injured because she had not been informed that she could win for herself his temporal estate by violation of her husband's dying wishes, and at the price of sacrificing his soul's happiness.

Held, that it was no part of the duty of the trustees to suggest that infamous alternative to her mind (153-4).

A suit was instituted on behalf of B, a minor, for a declaration that he was the validly adopted son of one K, having been adopted by the appellant, K's widow, under an authority to adopt executed by him in her favour. The defendants in the suit were the appellant, a daughter-in-law of K, who set up an authority to adopt by her husband in her favour and the adoption of G in pursuance thereof, and other persons. Pending the suit, the daughter-in-law died, and G was brought on record in her place. The first Court found against the authority to adopt set up in the plaint decided against the title of B, and dismissed the suit. Against that decree B preferred an appeal and died pending the appeal; and the appellant was substituted on record for him on her own application. The appellate Court concurred in the findings of the lower Court and dismissed the appeal.

On appeal by the appellant from the decree in appeals their Lordships observed: The appellant is now entitled as a Hindu female heiress to the whole estate; if she makes any further adoption, the validity of that adoption will be probably tried between the party adopted and those who will be the heirs of her husband on her death. In any such suit it is difficult to see how the decree in this suit can be admitted as evidence for the purpose of showing the invalidity of the instrument of adoption (302). The sole surviving coparcener of a Hindu family made a will in 1889, which contained an appointment of his wife and his daughter to be executrixes, and consisted of two parts, namely, (1) a disposal of ancestral property of the family, and (2) an authority to his widow in a certain event to take a son by adoption.

Adoption—Authority to adopt—(Contd.)

The testator had nominated as his son, V, a son of his daughter, but had not completed his adoption. By the will, the testator directed that, if he himself should die before completing the adoption of V, his wife should, after his death, complete the necessary ceremonies and take V in adoption. The will further directed that, if V should predecease the testator's wife, she might take in adoption one of V's brothers, and give his properties to that son.

The testator completed the adoption of V, and subsequently, in March, 1890, he made another will, which disclosed on its face that the property of which it purported to dispose was ancestral, and provided that, in case V should happen to die at any time, his issue should enjoy the property disposed of by the will of 1889, and that, if V died issueless, it should go to his brothers. That will of 1890, however, contained no words of revocation of the previous will, was wholly silent as to adoption, and did not refer in any way by revocation or otherwise to the clause in the will of 1889, which gave the widow a contingent power of adoption.

V died after the testator but during the lifetime of his widow. Subsequently the will of 1890 was, in a suit by the reversionary heirs of the testator, declared null and void and inoperative according to Hindu Law. In that state of things, the testator's widow adopted, in 1906, P, a brother of V.

Held, affirming the Court below, that the contingent power to adopt in the will of 1889 was unaffected by anything in the later will of 1890, and that, in 1906, the widow had the power of adoption which she exercised (25-6).

The will of 1889 consists of two parts, and assuming for the moment that the will of 1889 has been revoked as regards the part which effects a disposal of the property, it does not touch the other part, namely, that which gives a power to adopt (24). WILL GIVING.

———Dispositions of property made by—Validity of—Validity of authority if dependent upon.

The surviving coparcener of a Mitakshara joint family by his will made certain dispositions of property and also gave his widow power to adopt a son. The dispositions became invalid by reason of the birth of a posthumous son to his pre-deceased brother, but they were within the competence of the surviving coparcener at the date of the will and at the date of his death, and were only liable to be defeated in one event (which in fact happened), namely, his brother's widow giving birth to a son. And the will expressly said that, supposing that event to occur, the adoption should still be made.

Held, that the power of the surviving coparcener's widow to adopt was not, upon the true construction of the will, dependent upon the dispositions of property made by the will taking effect (113). WILL OR—TEST—DEED—CONSTRUCTION.

——— A Hindu, who had a son then living, executed an instrument in the following terms in favour of his wife :—"This is an Onoomattee Puttro to the following purport—Prior to the birth of a male child from your womb, I executed in your favour an Onoomattee Puttro on the subject of your receiving an adopted son. Subsequently, by the will of God, you have given birth to a male child. Still, having regard to the future, I have again given you permission. If, which God forbid, the male child of your body be non-existent, then you will adopt a son from my race or from a different race, for the purpose of performing mine or your Sraddh and other rites, and for the Sheba of the Gods, and for the succession to the zemindary and other property, on which, if the adopted son be non-existent, which God forbid, then you shall, according to your pleasure, on failure of one, adopt other sons in succession, to avoid the extinction of the Pinda ; that dattaka son shall be entitled to perform your and my Sraddh, etc., and of our ancestors." On a construction of the instrument, the Sudder Dewanny held that it was of the nature of a testamentary disposition, and that it created a limitation on failure of male issue of the testator, in the lifetime of his wife, to the son to be adopted by her as a persona designata. Held by their Lordships, reversing the decision of the Court below, that the instrument was merely, what it purported to be, a deed of permission to adopt, and was not of a testamentary character.

The instrument was registered as a deed in the lifetime of the maker ; it contains no words of devise, nor was it the intention of the maker that it should contain any disposition of his estate, except so far as such disposition might result from the adoption of a son under it. He mentions the objects which induced him to make the deed—religious motives, the perpetuation of his family, and the succession to his property ; but it was by the adoption, and only by the

———A deed executed by a Hindu in favour of his wife was called a will, in the body of the deed. Its only operative contents were as follows: "I have been laid up with severe bodily illness for about the last seven months. Consequently having had serious misgivings, and not having until now been blessed with an heir-apparent for want of divine favour, I have consented to your adopting a son at your pleasure and conducting the management of the estate in the best manner. None of my heirs shall have cause to raise disputes touching this matter. This will has been executed with my consent."

Held that the document was not a will, but only a power to adopt and as such ought to have been registered as being an authority to adopt a son, not conferred by a will within the meaning of S. 17 of the Registration Act of 1877.

The references to property that occur in the deed are no more than consequences of the guardianship of the wife, and the character of being a will is not established independently of these. Adoption—Capacity to be adopted.

———Brother's son—Law as to—Text basis of—Applicability of rule to case of divided family.

The whole of the law supposed to affirm the necessity of adopting a brother's son seems to have been deduced by the ancient commentators, with what logical consequence it is unnecessary to consider, from a text of Manu, which says:—"If one among brothers of the whole blood be possessed of male issue, Manu pronounces that they all are fathers of the same by means of that son." The direct consequence of this might well be that in an undivided family (the normal state of a Hindu family) the nephew, without further act of affiliation, would effectually perform the funeral obsequies of his uncle, whose share in the joint family property, in the absence of male issue, would pass to his coparceners by survivorship. But in the case of a separated Hindu, the right of performing his obsequies, with the consequent right of succession, is, in the absence of male issue, in his ———Brother's son—Texts relating to—Mandatory or recommendatory — Distant relation—Adoption of, when brother's son available—Validity.

The question was as to the validity of the defendant's adoption. The adoption was made by a deceased person who was governed by the Benares School of law, and who was a divided Hindu. The objection to the adoption was that it was one of a very distant relation, not even within the class of the deceased's sapindas, made in violation of the preferential right of D, the only son of the deceased's brother by the whole blood, to be adopted.

Held, that the defendant's adoption was not invalid (54).

It may be conceded that the texts of the Hindu law do in terms prescribe that a Hindu wishing to adopt a son shall adopt the son of his whole brother, if such a person be in existence and capable of adoption, in preference to any other person; and qualify the otherwise fatal objection to the adoption of an only son of the natural father, by saying that, in the case of a brother's son, he should, nevertheless, be adopted in preference to any other person as a dvyamushyana, or son of two fathers (50).

The grave question, however, that arises is whether the injunctions just referred to are merely binding upon the consciences of pious Hindus as defining what they ought to do, or are so imperative as to have the force of laws, the violation whereof should be held in a court of justice to invalidate an adoption which has otherwise been regularly made (50).

The omission to adopt a brother's son is not an objection which at law invalidates an adoption otherwise regularly made, and so destroys the civil status of the person thus adopted (51). The adoption had been recognised by the members and the friends of the family for a period of over 16 years; the respondent performed the funeral obsequies of R and his widow, and he incurred fairly considerable expense in giving his sister by adoption in marriage.

———In a case in which the validity of an adoption alleged to have been made, and of a will alleged to have been executed, by a deceased person depended upon the question whether the deceased was of sufficient capacity at the time to understand the nature and object of those acts, and voluntarily gave an intelligent consent to their performance, the evidence showed that the state of the deceased on the day in question was that of a dying man, almost continually insensible, though occasionally roused to consciousness by loud tones, or by pungent applications to his nostrils, but almost immediately afterwards relapsing into a state of insensibility, and when momentarily conscious, with his mind quite inert and instantly fatigued upon the slightest exertion.

Held, reversing the concurrent decision of the Courts below, that on the day in question the deceased was quite incompetent to perform the adoption, or any other act requiring the exercise of the powers of judgment and reflection (435).

How is it possible that a person in such a condition could be capable of any act requiring judgment and reflection, especially one to which no antecedent circumstances appear to have led, and for which the enfeebled and scarcely conscious mind was unprepared. In such a state as that described, even if the mind were passively awake to the suggestions made to it, it would naturally cling to repose, and yield, for the sake of it, to any external suggestion. Viewing the adoption and the will together, they present every appearance of a concerted family arrangement. If the law were to countenance acts of this description, performed at such a time and under such circumstances, without the clearest and most cogent evidence to establish their validity, relations and managers would be encouraged to advance their own private notions of what might be advisable to be done for the good of the family, and to ascribe acts to a dying man in which he would have been the merely passive instrument to prolong their own gain and authority.

The deceased was on the day in question quite incompetent to perform the adoption, or any other act requiring the exercise of the powers of judgment and reflection (434-5). (Lord Chelmsford.) TAYAMMAUL v. SESHACHALLA NAIKER. (1865) 10 M. I. A. 429 = 2 Sar. 139.

———Mode of—Deed—Giving and taking by mere—Validity—Sudras—Twice-born classes.

The mode of giving and taking a child in adoption continues to stand on Hindu law and Hindu usage. According to Hindu usage, which the Courts should accept as governing the law, the giving and taking in adoption ought to take place by the father handing over the child to the adoptive mother, and the adoptive mother declaring that she accepts the child in adoption (255-6).

While thinking it unnecessary positively to decide the question whether there can be, amongst Sudras, according to Hindu law and usage, an adoption simply by deed, and without that corporeal delivery and acceptance of the child which is almost universally treated as the essential part of an adoption in the Dattaka form, their Lordships desired to say that they were very far from wishing to give any countenance to the notion that there can be such a giving and a taking as is necessary to satisfy the law, even in a case of Sudras, by mere deed, without an actual delivery of the child by the father (255).

Amongst the twice-born classes there could be no such adoption by deed, because certain religious ceremonies, the datta homam in particular, are in their case requisite (256). (*Sir James W. GIFT AND ACCEPTANCE—DEEDS OF—ADOPTION BY.

———Intention of parties—Construction of deeds—Registration thereof—Effect on question of intention—Evidence as to formal adoption—Effect.

In a case in which there were certain deeds of gift and acceptance of a child, the question was whether it was the intention of the parties, when they put their hands to those two instruments, that an adoption should be effected by the mere execution, without more, of those instruments, or, whether the execution of them was intended to be a mere step in the proceedings which were to result at one time or another in a complete and full adoption.

Held, on a construction of the deeds in question and on the other evidence in the case, that it never was the intention of the parties to treat the execution of the deeds, without more, as an adoption (255).

The words of the deeds point to an adoption in the customary and formal manner, and to something being done ultra the mere execution of those two instruments (254).

Although the circumstance of the immediate registration as well as that of the execution of the deeds, would, of course, be very cogent evidence upon the issue whether there had been a formal and regular adoption, and might, if the other evidence that was given upon that point had been nicely balanced, have been sufficient to turn the scale, it is of far less weight upon the question whether it was the intention of the parties, without more, to treat the execution of the deeds as an adoption (254-5). Datta homam is the service of the burning of clarified butter, which is offered as a sacrifice by fire by way of religious propriation or oblation (148).

The authorities, ancient and modern, are not in accord on the point as to whether the ceremonial of datta homam is a legal as well as a religious requisite. There is a danger, on the one hand, of not paying due respect to those religious rites which are observed and followed among large classes of Indian belief, while, on the other hand, the danger must also be avoided of carrying these, except when the law is clear, into the legal sphere, so as to affect or impair personal or patrimonial rights (148-9). Adoption—Co-widows.

———Adoptions by, and contract between, conferring rights on adopted sons (minors) during their lives—Suit to enforce contract by one adopted son against other widow and her adopted son—Maintainability.

The two widows of a deceased Hindu adopted each a boy in pursuance of a direction to that effect in their husband's will. After the adoption they executed an ikrar, by which each recognised the adoption made by the other and the rights of that adopted son as such. They also undertook to manage the properties, a portion of the profits of which was by their husband's will devoted to the upkeep of a family Thakoor, and to pay the various charges upon the said properties directed by the same will, during the minority of the said adopted sons. The surplus left out of the income of the said properties, after paying the said charges and meeting the expenses of the widows and the expenses of the maintenance and education of their respective adopted sons, the widows undertook to keep in their respective custody, and to make over the accumulations to their respective adopted sons on their attaining their majority.

The ikrar was not an isolated transaction, but was one of a series of transactions closely connected with the adoption. The use of the boys was a necessary part of the attempt on the part of the widows to accomplish their husband's wishes, and by the said transactions the position in life of the boys was substantially altered by taking them away from their natural families for an indefinite time.

In a suit brought, after the death of the elder widow, by the son adopted by her, in effect for the administration of the testator's estate, basing his claim, inter alia, on the ikrar, held that, in the circumstances of the case, the adopted sons could not be said to be such strangers in the matter that they could not insist on the performance of the contract contained in the ikrar by which each widow bound herself to the other to deal with the estate in their favour, and that the plaintiff was accordingly entitled, under the ikrar, to receive one moiety of the surplus income during the life of the younger widow, the son adopted by the latter being entitled to the other moiety during her lifetime (132-3). ———Adoption invalid by each of—Agreement by, recognising adopted sons as heirs and conferring upon each right to his mother's share of income and accumulations—Effect and binding nature of.

By his will a Hindu bequeathed all his property to a family Thakoor, and directed each of his two widows to adopt a son. The will provided that the two adopted sons should remain the shebaits of all the dedicated properties, that, up to the time that the said adopted sons attained their majority, the two widows should exercise the care and control of all the said properties, and that, when the two adopted sons attained their majority, the widows should make over to them as shebaits all the dedicated properties. The will also directed that out of the surplus income left after payment of the expenses of the debsheba, the two adopted sons were to receive a fixed allowance. The residue was left undisposed of by the will.

The widows made the double adoption contemplated by the will, and then executed an ikrar relating to the management and enjoyment of the estate. The ikrar stated that the two adopted sons became the heirs and representatives of the deceased, as if they had been born of his loins, that during their minority, the widows should, as their mothers and guardians, continue to take care of them and that neither the widows nor their heirs were competent to raise any objection to the rights of the said adopted sons. The ikrar provided that the two widows should in equal shares as shebaits continue in possession of and preserve the debutter property, paying in equal shares the various charges upon it. It provided for a division between the widows in equal shares of the surplus left after meeting the said expenditure and for the appropriation by them of the amount necessary for their own expenses and the expenses of the maintenance and education of the adopted sons. The balance left after all these expenses, the ikrar provided, should be kept in the custody of each widow, and should be handed over by each to her adopted son on his attaining his majority.

The elder widow died, and, after her death, the plaintiff, the boy adopted by her, sued the younger widow and the boy adopted by her, in effect for the administration of the testator's estate, basing his claim, inter alia, upon the ikrar.

Held that, upon the true construction of the ikrar, and in the events that had happened, the plaintiff became entitled to receive the accumulations of one moiety of the surplus income of the testator's property, after answering the various charges and outgoings mentioned in the ikrar, during the life of the younger widow, and that the boy adopted by the younger widow was entitled to the other moiety of such surplus income during the life of his adoptive mother, and to the accumulations thereof (133).

The plaintiff's claim rested not upon any estoppel against the younger widow or upon any trust undertaken by her, but upon a contract binding the younger widow to the elder and to the son adopted by her (plaintiff) to give the plaintiff the same benefit out of the property of the last male owner as if he had been one of his two validly adopted sons and heirs ———Choice and adoption by widows acting jointly—Authority to adopt giving power of—What amounts to—Adoption by one after death of other—Validity in case of.

The words of the will of a Hindu authorizing his two widows to adopt a son to him were as follows:—" You should adopt a boy who is our Sannihita (one closely related) whenever it strikes you that our Samastanam (family) should continue."

The testator died in 1864; the junior widow died in 1881. It was not until the year 1885 that any steps were taken with regard to the adoption of a boy. In that year the surviving widow purported to adopt one V. That so-called adoption of V was declared by the Court to be invalid, and thereupon in the year 1890 the surviving widow purported to adopt N.

Held that at the death of the junior widow the power to adopt given by the testator to his widows came to an end, and that therefore the alleged adoption of N was of no validity.

The words of the will when properly construed relate to choice and adoption by the two widows acting jointly. Hence those words relate only to the period of time when both widows are living. The will is silent as to the period after the death of one of the widows, and if their Lordships were to hold that the surviving widow could adopt a son after the death of her co-widow they would be providing for a period of time which the testator left unprovided for and unnoticed in his will, i.e., they would be making an addition to his testamentary dispositions which is a thing that no Court is entitled to do. It was argued that a joint power of adoption is in accordance with Hindu notions, that in some parts of India, when adoption has not been forbidden by a husband, the power falls to his widows jointly, and that the law provides for the case of a disagreement. That is true in Western India, but there is no evidence that such a custom is known in Oudh. It is hardly applicable to the case of a family where the custom is single heirship and not joint possession

Held that the second widow of a deceased Hindu could not validly adopt a son to him during the lifetime of another son previously adopted to him by his first widow (132-3.)

It is settled law that a man cannot, while he has an adopted son living, adopt another son. It follows on principle that a man cannot delegate to others, to be exercised after his death, any greater power than he himself possessed in his lifetime. His second widow could not, therefore, by virtue of any authority delegated from him, adopt a son while another son adopted by his first widow was still living (133). (*Sir Robert P. ———Simultaneous adoption by—Authority for—Invalidity of—Exercise of power in any other way recognised by law—Impossibility of.

An authority to adopt given to a Hindu widow by her husband must be followed strictly, so that where a Hindu by his will directs his two widows, each to adopt a son, i.e., authorises the simultaneous adoption of two sons, it is impossible to exercise the power otherwise than in strict compliance with its terms, though the result of an attempted adoption in accordance with the power would be in contravention of the Hindu law and so without any effective result. If the widows are to procure sons for their husband at all, it must be by the simultaneous adoption of two. It is impossible even to try the question whether their husband's wishes could be fulfilled, unless two boys were found whose parents were willing to give them in adoption one for each widow (121-2). The question was whether a power to adopt given by a Hindu to his two widows authorised simultaneous adoptions by them.

Held that, if it appeared that the law on the subject of simultaneous adoptions at the time when that authority was given was in such a state that it was extremely doubtful whether simultaneous adoptions could be made, or that from the state of the law it was not likely that there was a practice of that kind, that would be a reason for construing that document as not intended to give a power of simultaneous adoption (202).

In construing the document their Lordships would consider that the person giving the authority intended his widows

God forbid it, but if the son adopted by either Ranee should die, or be unfit for duty by reason of illness of any kind, then in such a case she will be competent to take in adoption a second son, and so on to a third.'

———Simultaneous adoptions by both—Successive adoptions by each of—Power of—Authority conferring—Test.

An authority to adopt given by a Hindu to his two widows was as follows :—

"You, S, the elder widow, may adopt three sons successively, and you, B, the younger widow, may adopt three sons successively, and that (or those) adopted son (or sons) will be entitled to offer pind."

Held that the authority might be reasonably construed as giving to the two widows, not a power to adopt simultaneously, but first to the elder widow power to adopt three sons successively, and then a similar power to the younger widow (201).

The words are capable possibly of another construction, but certainly rather the mere natural construction would be that it was a power to adopt successively. It may be observed that if it gave to the younger widow a power to make an adoption simultaneously with an adoption by the elder widow, the elder widow would not be able to adopt three sons successively, because there would be interposed an adoption of a son by the younger widow. That seems to be a reason for not putting such a construction upon the words (201-2). (Sir Richard Couch.) AKHOY CHUNDER BAGCHI v. KALAPAHAR HAJI. (1885) 12 I. Held, reversing the courts below on this point, that the onus of proving that the adoption was lawful was upon the defendant, who relied upon it to defeat the plaintiff's title (81).

Looking at the origin and history of the family, it appears that the question is not whether the general Hindu law is modified by a family custom forbidding adoption, but whether with respect to inheritance the family is governed by Hindu law, or by customs which do not allow an adopted son to inherit. If the family was generally governed by Hindu law, the defendant might rely upon that, and then the onus of proving a family custom would be on the plaintiff (81). The question was a member of the Baikunthpore Branch of the Kuch Behar family was competent to adopt and to alter the line of succession thereby.

The family affected to be Hindus, but they were not generally governed by Hindu law and had retained and were governed by family customs which, as regards some matters, were at variance with Hindu law. The question, therefore, was whether, by the usage by which the family was governed, it was lawful for a member thereof to adopt a son and to alter the time of succession thereby.

Held, without regarding any burden of proof, that it was not lawful for a member to adopt a son who would succeed to his estate (83).

Their Lordships find that through sixteen devolutions of the estate there has been no instance of a succession by adoption, though in three instances the circumstances were such as usually move Hindus to make an adoption ; that there has been one instance of an attempt at adoption, and that, whatever its exact issue may have been, it failed to carry away the succession from the collateral heir ; that there is a considerable amount of family tradition against the practice ; and that of counter-evidence there is absolutely none. Whether, if the Baikunthpur family were shown to

The material passages of the will of a childless Hindu were in these terms : "And as I am desirous of adopting a son I declare that I have adopted K, third son of my eldest brother S. My wives shall perform the ceremonies according to the shastras, and bring him up, and until that adopted son comes of age, those executors shall look after and superintend all the property, moveable and immoveable, in my own name or benami, left by me, also that adopted son. The deed executed by the plaintiff addressed to the defendant commenced :—

"This is a deed of adoption . . . . My husband, in consideration of his having no issue in his lifetime, gave me permission to adopt a son. At present, in obedience to the aforesaid injunction . . . . I do, with the prescribed rites and ceremonies, adopt as my son your second son. The said child has thus become divested of all the rights and gotra (lineage) appertaining to your family, and has become vested for ever with the rights and gotra of my husband's family. By virtue of which he having become equal to the son of my body is become the owner himself and his heirs of all my husband's property. He will henceforth perform the funeral rites, etc., of myself and my husband and of his (my husband's) paternal and maternal ancestors, and shall also perform the religious and family rites and other duties for ever. The plaintiff, a Hindu widow, brought a suit against the defendant for himself and as guardian of his minor son to set aside two deeds, relating to the adoption of the said minor. One of the deeds was a deed by which the defendant agreed to give the said minor to the plaintiff for adoption in the Dattaka form ; the other was a deed by which she agreed to take the said boy in adoption. The case for the plaintiff was that, notwithstanding the deeds, the defendant refused to give the child, and that therefore the form of adoption had not been complied with.

Held that, if the instruments operated merely as agreements to give and accept the child in adoption, as contended by the plaintiff, the breach by the defendant of his agreement to give would not render the deeds null and void (160).

The breach of an agreement by one of the parties thereto is a good ground for an action for damages, or for a specific performance, but it does not render the contract void or constitute any ground for setting it aside, or for declaring it to be null and void (160). In a suit by a Hindu widow against the natural father of a minor boy to set aside two deeds, by one of which the defendant agreed to give the said minor to the plaintiff for adoption by her in the Dattaka form, and by the other of which the widow agreed to take the said child in adoption, the plaintiff's case was that, notwithstanding the deeds, the defendant refused to give the child, and that therefore the form of adoption had not been complied with. The cause of action for the suit was stated to be the defendant's refusal to execute an ikrarnamah cancelling the said deeds.

Held, that the question for decision in such a suit was not one as to the validity of the adoption, but as to whether sufficient ground existed for setting aside the deeds or declaring them to be null and void (157).

The real question for decision in such a case is whether, if there was no adoption, it was owing to the fault of the defendant, or to the fault of the plaintiff herself (158). (Sir Barnes Peacock.) SREE NARAIN MITTER v. SREEMUTTY KISHEN SOONDORY DASSEE.

———Deeds of—Declaration of invalidity and cancellation of—Suit by widow against natural father for—Maintainability—Discretion of Court—Minor adopted son not party to suit.

A Hindu widow sued the defendant for himself and as guardian of his minor son to set aside two deeds, by one of which the defendant agreed to give the said minor to her for adoption in the Dattaka form, and by the other of which she agreed to take the said child into adoption. The plaintiff's case was that, notwithstanding the deeds, the defendant refused to give the child, and that, therefore, the form of adoption had not been complied with. The minor was not made a party to the suit.

Held, reversing the Courts below, that it would not be exercising a sound discretion, even if it could be done, to order the deeds to be cancelled or to set them aside, or to declare them void (163).

The minor not being a party to the suit, any declaration made in it with regard to the validity or invalidity of the deeds will not be binding upon him. The defendant takes no interest under the deed of adoption, and a declaration binding upon him only and not upon the child would be worse than useless (162-3).

Whether the child was adopted or not the defendant was not bound to execute a deed in cancellation of the former instruments, and his refusal to execute such a deed could not give the plaintiff a cause of action as alleged in the plaint (163). In a case in which there were deeds of gift and adoption, held that the fact that, while the deed of gift was given by the natural father to the adopting widow, the deed of adoption was retained by her and not given to the natural father would rather tend to show that at that time it was considered that the child had been adopted (154).

If the child was adopted, the widow became his mother and guardian, and would naturally keep the deeds of gift and adoption on behalf of the child as evidence of the adoption, and as part of the muniments of her child's title to his adoptive father's estates (154). (Sir Barnes Peacock.)

To constitute a dvyamushyayana there must be a special agreement between the two fathers to that effect; or the relation must result from some of the other circumstances indicated by Sir William Macnaghten at p. 71 of his Principles and Precedents (50 1). The consequences of a dvyamushyayana adoption are different from those of an ordinary adoption inasmuch as the children of the adopted sons would revert to their natural family. Mr. Roberts, the Collector of the District at the time, deposed that, in the course of the years 1824 and 1825, a boy of an age corresponding with that of L, and who, by other evidence, was shown to have been L, was brought by J upon several occasions on which he paid a visit at the Collector's office, and that the boy was treated by J, and considered by him, the Collector, as his adopted son. He said that the boy accompanied J upon every visit except the first; that he had frequent communication with J upon the subject; that he considered the boy to be brought in order that he might be recognised as an adopted son; and that so satisfied was he, Mr. Roberts, of the facts, that on J's death, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, he should have considered him his heir.

Held, that the evidence of Mr. Roberts was most important, and that the Courts below erred in assuming that he lay under a misconception of what had passed in a conversation in a language which was not vernacular to either party (105, 111-2),

The assumption of the Courts below is a purely gratuitous assumption. It would have been a strong assumption if Mr. Robert's opinion had been formed from a single conversation; but he states that he had frequent communications with J upon the subject, that the boy was brought to him by J four or five times, was treated by J as his son, and was brought, as he considered, in order that his title as such might be known and recognised. Where the question was whether the plaintiff had been adopted by the husband of the defendant, held, that the fact that the defendant and her co-widow then alive remained in possession of the estate of their husband after his death and that they paid income-tax on that property inclined the preponderance, if the scales were at all evenly balanced, in favour of the defendant's contention that the plaintiff had not been so adopted (754).

This payment of income-tax on the part of the widows is inconsistent with the case of the plaintiff, who alleges that he had been adopted, and that they, consequently, had merely a title to maintenance ; and, if his case were true, he, and not they, would have been entitled to the possession of the estate, and liable to the payment, amongst other things, of this tax (754). ———Widows of adopter becoming Suttees—Declaration by, that they have neither son nor daughter—Effect—Son in declaration means natural-born son.

The question was whether the appellant had been adopted by one G. To disprove the alleged adoption the respondents relied upon a report made by the police of the examination of the two widows of G, on the occasion of their becoming Suttees.

The report contained the examination of the Police Officers of the widows, previous to their being burned with the corpse of their husband, and they were there stated to have declared, that they had no son nor daughter, which it was said would not be true. if the appellant had been the adopted son of their husband.

On referring to the Regulation, however under which that official examination took place, as well as to the nature of the examination itself, it appeared that the question applied to natural-born children. That the widows understood it in that sense appeared from the words of their answers, the words being " We have no son nor daughter, we are barren."

Held, that the report could not therefore be relied upon as in any way militating against the appellant's case of adoption (429). (Mr. Pemberton Leigh.) HURADHUN MOOKURJIA v. MUTHORANATH MOOKURJIA.

The Dattaka Chandrika has been for long and still is accepted in the Presidency of Madras as a treatise on adoption of the highest authority. It, however, does not necessarily follow from the fact that the Dattaka Chandrika has been long accepted in Southern India as a high authority on the law of adoption that comments and propositions, apparently then novel, contained in it, if not based on ancient texts which can with some certainty be identified, have been accepted by the Hindus of Southern India as part of the Hindu law (292). FOUNDATION OF.

———Religious duty—Devolution of property—Court of Justice—Duty of.

It may be the duty of a Court of Justice administering the Hindu law to consider the religious duty of adopting a son as the essential foundation of the law of adoption; and the effect of an adoption upon the devolution of property as a mere legal consequence (193). ORIGIN OF.

———The law of adoption owes its origin to the timorous superstition of the inhabitants of India. These people, vainly imagining that, by leaving male children in this world, they secure themselves against the torments of the next, seem to have been so anxious to obtain natural or adopted sons, that they have established but imperfect securities against fabricated adoptions. Adoption—Onus of proof of.

———Admission in deeds not inter partes—Effect—Shifting of onus—Estoppel.

In a suit by the plaintiff claiming to be entitled to the suit property as the son and heir of P, the defendant pleaded that, though the natural son of P, the plaintiff had been given away in adoption to P's brother, K. In support of her plea the defendant tendered in evidence and relied upon deeds under the hand and seal of the plaintiff himself stating that he was the adopted son of K. No attempt was, however, made on the part of the plaintiff to prove satisfactorily that the admissions contained in the deeds to which he was a party were untrue in fact.

Held, that the admissions in the said deeds shifted the burden of proof on to the plaintiff; that though, as the defendant was not a party to those deeds, there was no estoppel and it was open to the plaintiff to rebut the presumption arising from the admissions in those deeds, he not having satisfactorily done so, the fact admitted must be taken to be established (35-6). ———Adopted son alleged—Suit by.

The question for decision was whether the plaintiff had been adopted by B, a deceased Hindu. These were the broad facts of the case. At the hearing several depositions made in previous suits by witnesses examined in the present suit were admitted in evidence without the necessary foundation for their admission having been laid. The most vital points were not elucidated. The most suspicious circumstances were not proved. The most important and decisive documents were not produced. Due weight had not been given in the Courts in India to the conduct of the plaintiff; the improbability and inconsistency of the story told on his behalf; his absence from the witness-chair; and the non-production of all books or documents. The conduct of the trial was, on the whole, eminently unsatisfactory.

The Sub-Judge decided, as a fact, on the evidence before him that the plaintiff had not been adopted. The High Court, on the same evidence, decided that he had been adopted.

On appeal the Privy Council held that the sounder view was between those two extremes and that the plaintiff had not discharged the onus which rested upon him of proving the adoption. The importance of the evidence afforded by accounts has been recognised by this Board (I. L. R. 32 All. 104):—

Their Lordships observed: Although a deed of adoption, or a formal written record of the fact of adoption, may have to be carefully scrutinised if forgery is alleged, it is certainly remarkable that in such a case as the present no deed or other formal written record can be produced which gives any support to the claim made on behalf of the appellant. This Board in 2 Knapp. 287 said :—

" Although neither written acknowledgments, nor the performance of any religious ceremonial, are essential to the validity of adoptions, such acknowledgments are usually given, and such ceremonies observed, and notices given of the times when adoptions are to take place, in all families of distinction, as those of zemindars or opulent Brahmins, that wherever these have been omitted, it behoves this Court to regard with extreme suspicion the proof offered in support of an adoption. I would say that in no case should the rights of wives and daughters be transferred to strangers, or more remote relatives, unless the proof of adoption, by which that transfer is effected, be proved by evidence free from all suspicion of fraud, and so consistent and probable as to give no occasion for doubt of its truth." ———Notification to Government of fact of adoption—Absence of, in case of a great family.

With respect to the absence of any formal notification to the Government of the act of adoption, it is admitted on all hands not to be necessary. ———Notification to Government of fact of adoption—Absence of, in a great family—Adverse presumption from—Circumstances diminishing.

The question was whether L, had been adopted by J. One of the two circumstances which were much against the adoption was the absence of proof of any formal notification to the Government, and of that degree of notoriety which might be expected of a fact of so such importance in such a family. It appeared that the adoptive father of J had himself made communications to the Government with respect to the adoption of J, and of another boy, and that he endeavoured to have their titles recognised.

Held, that the absence of any such communications in the case of L was important, but that there were circumstances in evidence by which the weight of the objection was very considerably diminished (108).

At the time of the alleged adoption of L, J was at law with the Collector of the District, who refused to deliver up possession of some portions of the property of the adoptive father of J, claimed by J. It is not, perhaps, very unnatural to suppose that, under such circumstances, J would not willingly have any communications with the Collector not absolutely necessary. But there were other disputes at this time between J and the Government authorities. A, one of the wives of J, or her brother on her behalf, had complained to the Civil Magistrate of the conduct of J towards her and he had been fined There were also other differences subsisting between them. That at a subsequent time there was some written communication to the Collector of Masulipatam, in which district a portion of the estate of J was situated, there is much reason to believe (108-9). ———Oral evidence—Case depending upon — Denial of adoption by alleged adoptive father—Suit for declaration of its validity not commenced till after his death.

The only question in the appeal was whether the late M adopted the appellant as his son, and heir to the Hetta Zemindari. on the 10th November, 1898.

The appellant was born on the 26th October, 1898, and was the second son of Indrajit M was a relation on the agnatic side. At the time of the alleged adoption M had two young wives. There was no reason why he might not have issue by them ; two children were in fact born to him at a later date. Both Indrajit and M were Zemindars of considerable position.

There was no deed of adoption and the case for the appellant depended almost entirely on oral testimony. The District Judge found in favour of the appellant. His judgment was reversed by the Judicial Commissioner.

The evidence showed that M had from the outset consistently denied that he had adopted the appellant. Still, though it was open to Indrajit to commence a suit claiming to have the adoption of the appellant declared valid, no such suit was commenced until 2½ months after M's death. There was no reference to expenditure on the ceremony of adoption, either in the accounts of Indrajit or M. There was no deed of adoption or any other formal written record of the event at the time. No feast was proved to have taken place on the occasion of the adoption ; the ceremonies, said to have been performed, were of the briefest possible description ; no form or notification, was made to the authorities ; the child's name was not changed, and he was never taken to live with his new family, or recognised by them in any way.

Held, affirming the Court below, that all the surrounding circumstances and conditions made it highly improbable that M did adopt the appellant at the alleged date, and that, having regard to those conditions and circumstances, the oral evidence was quite insufficient to support the case of the appellant (210). ———Written acknowledgments—Notices to ruling power, to neighbours and to public generally—Absence of.

Although, according to the Hindu Law, neither written acknowledgments, nor the performance of any religious ceremonies, are essential to the validity of adoption, such acknowledgments are usually given, such ceremonies observed, and notices given of the time when adoptions are to take place, in all families of distinction, such as those of zemindars or opulent Brahmins. It is usual, when persons in the situation of life of the deceased adopt sons, to acknowledge such adoptions in writing, to give notice to the ruling power, and to invite the neighbouring Zemindars and others to be present at such adoptions. Wherever the above formalities have been omitted, it behoves the Court to regard with extreme suspicion the proof offered in support of an adoption. In no case, the rights of wives and daughters should be transferred to strangers or to more remote relations, unless the act of adoption, by which this transfer is effected, be proved by evidence free from all suspicion of fraud, and so consistent and probable as to give no occasion for doubt of its truth. (Lord Wynford.) SUTROOGUN SUTPUTTY v. SABITRA DYE. (1835) 5 W.R. (P.C.) 109 = 1 Suth. 36 (37-38) = 2 Knapp. 287.

She had given promise of having children, for she had borne a daughter and another child that had died.

Held, that the above-mentioned circumstances rendered the alleged adoption strikingly improbable.

Superstition was not likely to frighten a person so circumstanced into the doing an act by which his daughter would be disinherited, and the inheritance of any son or sons that he might have be divided with a stranger. (Lord Wynford.) SUTROOGUN SUTPUTTY v. SABITRA DYE.

Adoption—Presumption in favour of—Circumstances giving rise to—(Contd.)

The question was whether L had been adopted by J.

In the year 1819 when the adoption was alleged to have been made the situation of J was as follows :— He had married two wives, but had never had any issue by either of them. He was stated by some of the witnesses to have been from bodily infirmity very unlikely to have issue. That was so far confirmed by undisputed facts, that he lived for six years afterwards with R, one of his wives, and never had any issue. He might therefore reasonably presume, or perhaps knew, that he should have no natural-born son, or at all events no such son by R. With A, his other wife, he had quarrelled in April 1819 ; and previously to the alleged adoption, she had quitted his house, to which she never returned till after his death.

Held that, under those circumstances it could not but be held probable that he should choose to adopt a son (104).

Held further, that that probability was much confirmed when regard was had to the relation in which he stood towards them, who, if he left no issue, natural or adopted, would succeed to his joint possession, for either A, with whom he had quarrelled, would take alone or jointly with R, or Ramanadha, another adopted son of his adoptive father, with whom he was at law, and whose character of a brother he denied, would succeed (104).

———Dying man—Alleged adoption by—Acquiescence by his widow in—Presumption from—Effect of, in case of clear proof of incapacity of deceased to perform act.

In a case in which the validity of an adoption was disputed both on the ground that it never took place, and on the ground that the alleged adoptive father was on the date of the alleged adoption utterly incompetent to perform the act imputed to him, it was strongly urged against the widow of the deceased (one of the defendants chiefly contesting the adoption) in support of the validity of the adoption, that the widow was a consenting party to it, performing her part in the ceremony, and afterwards showing by unequivocal acts her entire acquiescence in what had taken place. Those acts were allowing the boy to perform the funeral rites as an adopted son, and the day after the adoption putting her mark to an arzee addressed to the collector, stating the adoption and the performance of the funeral rites by the adopted son, and praying for the transfer into his name of her late husband's property.

Held that, assuming the acts to be satisfactorily established, all that would not sustain the validity of the adoption, unless it clearly appeared that the act itself was performed under such circumstances as would render it perfectly legal (433).

The concurrence of the widow, and the various acts of acquiescence attributed to her, would be important if they were brought to bear upon a question which depended upon the preponderance of evidence ; but if the facts are once ascertained, presumptions arising from conduct cannot establish a right which the facts themselves disprove (433). HINDU LAW—(Contd.)

The case of a Hindu claiming by adoption is perhaps as strong as any case of the kind that can be put ; because when, under a document which is supposed and admitted by the whole family to be genuine, he is adopted, he loses the rights—he may lose them altogether—which he would have in his own family; and it would be most unjust after long lapse of time to deprive him of the status which he has acquired in the family into which he has been introduced, except upon the strongest proof of the alleged defect in his title (77). ———Lapse of time—Recognition of adoption.

The parties belonged to the sect of Gharbari Gosavis. One Z, a member of that sect, had two sons, R and J. J died in the lifetime of Z, leaving no son. The plaintiff asserted that after J's death his widow—with the concurrence of Z, adopted V, the plaintiff's father, as a son to J. That adoption was disputed by the appellants, and the question in the case was as to the factum and validity of the said adoption.

The suit in which the question arose was instituted in August, 1910. The alleged adoption was in about 1864. Z died in 1869 or 1870 ; R died in 1885 ; S, his widow, survived him for 20 years, dying in 1904.

The plaintiff's witnesses deposed to the fact that V was shaved, that he was adopted by being placed in the lap of the widow of J, and that the ceremony of Bija Hom was afterwards performed. Witnesses for the defendants, while admitting the ceremony of shaving, denied that there had been the further ceremony of Bija Hom, and said that the widow of J was not living and could not therefore have taken part in the ceremony of adoption. It was, however, agreed that from the date of the ceremony of shaving, V lived in his new family and bore a name showing that he belonged to it and had nothing to do with his former family. It was also proved that before the date of V's initiation, R had separated in estate from his father Z.

Held, affirming the courts below, that the proper presumption was that V, who had been styled on occasions both by R and by S as the son of J, and who had lived as if he were such a son all his life must be deemed to have been validly adopted (360). ———Old man without hope of issue natural-born—Prior adoption by—Alleged adoption soon after death of that adopted boy.

The question was whether appellant had been adopted by his deceased uncle, G.

At the time of the alleged adoption, it was clear, that G was advanced in years, about 67 years old, that he had two wives to whom he had long been married, by neither of whom he had ever had issue, and both of whom were of such an age, as to make it in the highest degree improbable that he should ever have by them a son of his body. He seemed long before the period to have despaired of having such issue, for eighteen years before he had adopted a boy, who, however, died without issue, shortly before the alleged adoption of the appellant. It was also clear from the evidence produced on both sides that G shared the average Hindu's anxiety to leave a son who would save him from "Put", and that it was out of this anxiety that he had adopted a boy eighteen years before.

Held, that under the circumstances the probability in favour of an adoption of some child was very strong (425-6).

Where the question was whether the adoption of the plaintiff, the factum of which was undisputed, was valid in point of law, or not, held that, on proof by the plaintiff of undisputed possession for a long space of time in his character of adopted son, every presumption of fact should be made in favour of the validity of the act by virtue of which it took place, and the onus of proving those circumstances which rendered it invalid in point of law, if the nature of the case required such proof, ought to lie on the other side. Much has been said of the old presumption which arises from the religious duty which is upon every childless Hindu to adopt a son. ———The only question for decision was whether the respondent was adopted by one Bijai Singh.

———In a suit brought by the respondent against a purdanashin lady and the presumptive reversionary heir to the estate of her deceased husband, the question was whether the respondent was adopted by the lady with the permission or by the direction of her deceased husband, given shortly before his death, as his son.

Held, reversing the High Court, that the respondent had failed to prove that he was adopted by the lady as alleged by him.

Having regard to all these facts—the contradictions between the principal witnesses examined on the respective sides on almost every important point ; the improbabilities of the respondent's story ; its inconsistency with the conduct and action of the principal parties concerned, as well as with the mode in which the business of the lady's firm was conducted and carried on ; the suppression of documents ; the non-appearance of the respondent as a witness at the trial to explain if he could, the many circumstances which called for explanation from him ; and, above and beyond all, the non-production of any account of the expenditure at the ceremony of adoption—their Lordships think that the most rational and just conclusion is this, that the respondent has failed to discharge the burden of proof of the adoption which undoubtedly lay upon him, that is, that his case is not proven. ———The question was whether W was the adopted son of S. The first Court thought the adoption proved. The appellate Court took a different view.

The adoption, if it took place, was about 50 years before suit, so that direct evidence of much value could hardly be looked for. Before the death of S, W was described as his adopted son. On the death of S, W succeeded to the estate of S without controversy, which he could only have done as adopted son, and enjoyed it and disposed of it as his own without controversy down to his death about nine years after. Almost every document, both during the life of W and since his death, was framed entirely upon the basis of the adoption.

———It is very strong confirmation of the truth of the adoption that, with one exception, all the witnesses who were called against the adoption, and professed to say there was no adoption, admit that the alleged adopted son was, some years before the death of the alleged adoptive father, brought to his house, and there lived with him, and was brought up in fact as his son, with a view to adoption. Now, no doubt, that does not of itself make an adopted son, or make him the heir, but when you find a larger body of witnesses who appear to have had quite as much or better knowledge of the facts, come and say that the ceremonies of adoption were actually performed, and that they were present at them, then the fact that these witnesses who deny the adoption are obliged to admit that the boy was being brought up in the house during the adoptive father's lifetime, very strongly confirms their evidence (507).

It is important also to consider on which side the possession went, because if the adoption was recognised soon or immediately after the adoptive father's death, and between his death and the death of the adopted son, the adopted son was the party in possession, and not the alleged heir, that is very much in favour of the adoption (508). The suit was instituted by the respondents, the collateral heirs of L, to set aside the adoption in the Dattaka form of B, her brother's son, as invalid, because no permission to adopt was given to the widow by her late husband, L. The defendant, the widow, asserted her husband's permission to the adoption, and that the adoption was valid.

Both the Courts below decided in favour of the respondents. The decree of the Sub-Judge was as follows :—"That this case be decreed with costs ; that the defendant's taking B as a dattakaputter and executing a deed of kurta putri be set aside and considered null and void ; and that the defendant, as an heir and widow of L deceased, do continue to hold possession and occupation of the properties of the deceased during her lifetime."

Their Lordships, while affirming the decrees below, observed that the decree could only be binding as between the plaintiffs and the defendants in the suit, and that it could not affect the interests of the defendants as between themselves, and that it could not affect the right of B as against the mother, the defendant, or the right of the heir of the mother as regards the peculiar property of the mother. The decree, their Lordships observed, should be read as if the words " as against the reversionary heirs of the husband" had been inserted after the word "void." In a suit brought after the death of B's widow by a person claiming to be her heir and to be entitled to the taluqa, of which the widow was taluqdar in her own right, as against S, S again set up the adoption. Held that, in view of the language of S. 13 of C. K was the original owner of certain properties. Shortly after his death his widow H, under a power given to her by K, adopted G, who was in possession of the estate until his death in February, 1834. G also died childless, and his widow B succeeded him as his heiress.

By an anumati patra executed by G shortly before his death, he empowered his widow with the consent of his mother, H, to adopt a son. That document contained expressions of confidence in H, in whose name the properties were registered, and directed that her name should continue to stand registered and she should have control as long as she lived. In 1846, B, under the power given to her by her late husband, adopted L, who thereupon became the heir and successor in title of his adoptive father G. H died in 1848.

On 8th August, 1837, H purported to grant to the predecessor in interest of the respondents certain mouzahs, appertaining to the estate of G on a permanent putni tenure.

L attained his majority in or about 1856. In 1880 L died, and was succeeded in title by his adopted son and heir, the appellant.

In a suit brought by the appellant on September 13, 1897, to recover from the putnidars the mouzahs granted on putni by H, held, affirming the High Court, that the suit was barred (84-5).

H had no estate in the property in question. On the most favourable view for the appellant she granted the putni as manager of the estate for B, the then legal owner. If the putni was void, the period of limitation ran from the date on which it was granted under Reg. II of 1803, as amended by Reg. II of 1805, which was then in force. But if it was voidable only by B's successor, the right of action arose on the adoption of L, and time would begin to run against him from the date when he attained his majority in 1856. Under either Reg. II of 1803 or Act XIV of 1859 time ran from the date when the cause of action arose (85). (Lord Davey.) RAI BANOMALI ROY BAHADUR v. JAGAT

The Privy Council affirmed the decree of the High Court. A Hindu widow, who had succeeded to the property of her husband as the heir of her deceased adopted son alienated two-thirds of her husband's estate. She then adopted the plaintiff under authority from her husband, having entered into an agreement with the natural father of the plaintiff whereby the natural father agreed that the plaintiff should inherit only the remaining one-third of the estate of his adoptive father. On coming of age, the plaintiff executed an agreement, dated 19th August, 1871, in favour of his adoptive mother the main object of which was to ratify the disposition which had been made of the two-thirds of the estate. By that agreement the plaintiff assigned to his adoptive mother a specific portion of the remaining land in lieu of maintenance. The agreement provided that the adoptive mother was to enjoy the land so assigned for her life, that she should not alienate or encumber the same, and that the same was to revert to the plaintiff upon her death.

It appeared that compensation money was paid to the adoptive mother by the railway department for a portion of the land so assigned to her, and the question arose whether the plaintiff was entitled to a portion of the said compensation money.

Held, that the plaintiff could not, by the agreement of 1871, be taken to have relinquished his claim to the said money, though it would be open to the widow to prove that the money received had been properly expended on the land (210). Notwithstanding the adoption, she prosecuted the suit in her own name, and, without objection raised by the other side, a decree for possession was passed in her favour, and the same was affirmed on appeal. In the appeal to the Privy Council objection was for the first time taken that, as the result of the adoption was to divest the whole property from the widow and to vest it in the adopted son, the suit commenced in the widow's own name and for her own benefit ought to have been dismissed, and that the decree awarding possession to her in her own right was not maintainable.

Held that, after the adoption, the widow must as a matter of law be deemed to have prosecuted the suit as guardian of her adopted son, that the decree must be considered to be for his benefit, and that she must be deemed to have been put in possession as trustee for him (243-4).

Where, however, the widow has taken by inheritance the separate estate of her husband, there is greater difficulty in laying down a rule. The power to adopt, when not actually given by the husband, can only be exercised when a foundation for it is laid in the otherwise neglected observance of religious duty, as understood by Hindus. Their Lordships do not think there is any ground for saying that the consent of every kinsman, however remote, is essential. The assent of kinsmen seems to be required by reason of the presumed incapacity of women for independence, rather than the necessity of procuring the consent of all those whose possible and reversionary interest in the estate would be defeated by the adoption. In such a case, therefore, the consent of the father-in-law, to whom the law points as the natural guardian and " venerable protector " of the widow, would be sufficient. It is not easy to lay down an inflexible rule for the case in which no father-in-law is in existence. Every such case must depend upon the circumstances of the family. All that can be said is, that there should be such evidence of the assent of kinsmen as suffices to show that the act is done by the widow in the proper and bona fide performance of her religious duty, and neither capriciously nor from a corrupt motive (442). ———A divided Hindu died issueless, leaving a widow. He had two cousins, who were the nearest reversionary heirs to his estate, and who were his nearest kinsmen. The widow of the deceased, who succeeded to his property, adopted a son. And the question was as to the validity of the said adoption.

One of the two cousins of the deceased, before the alleged adoption, executed a deed purporting to authorise it, and certain remoter kinsmen also signed that deed. At the time of the adoption, the widow asserted that her husband had before his death given her, orally, permission to take a boy in adoption. But that oral permission was found to be not true, and it appeared that it was only as a second and corroborative authority that the widow obtained the deed of consent mentioned above.

Held, that the adoption was invalid.

The failure to prove the husband's authority enters deeply into the question about the kinsmen's consent, for it cannot be disputed that the widow, in obtaining such consents as she did, represented herself to have received her husband's authority. The consents actually obtained were given, not in the exercise of an independent judgment on the expediency of the proposed adoption, but rather as the ratification of what must now be taken to be the non-existent authority of the deceased husband (25-6).

In truth, the facts of the case show that the mind of the kinsmen was not what the widow was in search of. The consent which she asked and obtained was ratification of the authority already given by the husband.

It is impossible now to set up this as an independent ground of the validity of the adoption. There is absent from this adoption the independent approval of the natural advisers of the widow (26). A Hindu widow adopted a son to her deceased husband with the assent of one of four sapindas, who were the surviving members of the joint family of which the deceased was during his lifetime also a member. The boy adopted was the son of the assenting sapinda. But for the adoption, the assenting sapinda and his three brothers would have been entitled to equal fourth shares of the joint family property. In the event of the adoption being valid, the adopted son would be entitled to a moiety of the family property, while the assenting sapinda and his brothers would be entitled to the other moiety, each of them being entitled to one-eighth of the whole. The assent to the adoption was given in pursuance of an arrangement with the widow by which the as-senting sapinda was to become the guardian of the adopted child, and, as such guardian, was to look after all the real and personal estate to which the adopted boy would be entitled, and to deliver the same to him on his attaining proper age. It was also stipulated in the deed of arrangement that the adopted boy was to take no interest in a village which was a portion of the joint family property.

Held that, in giving his assent, the assenting sapinda was influenced by undue considerations, and that the assent was not one which rendered the adoption valid and binding against his brothers (180).

By the adoption S (the assenting sapinda) himself would no doubt lose a portion of the share, which would pass to the adopted son ; but then he stipulated that he should remain guardian of the adopted son, so that until he should attain his full age no partition between himself and the adopted son could have been enforced, because he was the guardian; the widow could not have asked for a partition in the name of her son, because he had stipulated that S should be his guardian. The consequence was that by the arrangement made with the widow he really got during the minority the management of, and the interest in, as a member of the joint family (which, if a partition with his brothers should take place, would consist of himself and the adopted son), five-eighths of the estate. The brothers might have separated, but still the infant who was adopted could not have separated from S without bringing a suit against the latter for a partition ; and to such a suit the guardianship for which S had stipulated as part of the consideration for giving his consent to the adoption would have presented exceptional obstacles (179-80). Where the husband's family is in the normal condition of a Hindu family—i.e., undivided—the question who are the kinsmen whose assent will supply the want of positive authority from the deceased husband is of comparatively easy solution. In such a case the widow, under the law of all the schools which admit this disputed power of adoption takes no interest in her husband's share of the joint estate, except a right to maintenance. And though the father of the husband, if alive, might, as the head of the family and the natural guardian of the widow, be competent by his sole assent to authorise an adoption by her, yet, if there be no father, the consent of all the brothers, who, in default of adoption would take the husband's share, would probably be required, since it would be unjust to allow the widow to defeat their interest by introducing a new coparcener against their will (441-2.) On the question, who are the kinsmen whose assent will supply the want of a positive permission from the husband, there exists a broad distinction between cases in which the deceased husband was a member of a joint and undivided Hindu family, and those in which, he being separated, the widow has taken his estate by right of inheritance; but, even in the latter case, the assent of some person who stands to her in the relation of protector may be requisite (188-9). requisite authority in the case of an undivided family is to be sought by the widow within that family; that it is in the members of that family that she must presumably find such counsellors and protectors as the law makes requisite for her; and that she cannot at her will travel out of that undivided family and obtain the authorisation required from separated and remote kinsmen of her husband. This being the position of a widow in an undivided family, what are the conditions imposed on her if her husband happens to die in a state of separation from his kindred? Division does not affect her personal dependence or give her an independent status to alter by her own authority the succession to the estate which she takes as the widow of her husband. She is still dependent for counsel and protection upon the nearest sapindas of her husband, who are the most closely united to him by ties of blood, or, to use the language of Hindu lawyers, by "community of corporal particles." The father of the deceased, if still alive, continues to be her "natural guardian and venerable protector." He has furthermore a direct interest in the protection of the estate, for in case of her death without leaving her surviving a daughter or the mother of her deceased husband he has a right to the reversion. His authorisation is therefore essentially requisite to the validity of an adoption by her to her husband. If there is no father, the divided brothers take his place by virtue of the tie of blood as her husband's nearest sapindas; they become her natural guardians and the protectors of her interests. They also have an interest in the protection of the inheritance. In the absence, then, of the father the assent of the divided brothers is equally requisite for the validity of the widow's adoption. If a majority assent, and one refuses, his objection may be discounted. But the absence of their consent, or in case there is only one, of his consent, cannot be made good by the authorization of distant relatives remotely connected whose interest in the well-being of the widow or the spiritual welfare of the deceased, or in the protection of the estate, is of minute character, and whose assent is more likely to be influenced by improper motives (271-2). Positive authority affords a foundation for the doctrine (that a widow in the Dravida country can adopt with the assent of her husband's kinsmen) safer than any built upon speculations touching the natural development of the Hindu Law, or upon analogies, real or supposed, between adoption according to the Dattaka form, and the obsolete practice, with which that form of adoption co-existed, of raising up issue to the deceased husband by carnal intercourse with the widow. It may be admitted that the arguments founded on this supposed analogy are in some measure confirmed by passages in several of the ancient treatises of the Hindu Law, and in particular by the Dattaka Mimamsa; but as a ground for judicial decision these speculations are inadmissible, though as explanatory arguments to account for an actual practice they may be deserving of attention. ———The assumption is not well founded that the law of adoption by a widow with the assent of sapindas now prevalent in Madras is a substitute for the old and obsolete practice of raising up seed to a deceased husband by actual procreation; and that the limitations, if any, upon the power to adopt are to be traced by analogy from that practice. In the Ramnad case their Lordships made the following observations: "They think that positive authority affords a foundation for the doctrine safer than any built upon speculations touching the natural development of the Hindu Law, or upon analogies, real or supposed, between adoptions according to the Dattaka form, and the obsolete practice, with which that form of adoption co-existed, of raising up issue to the deceased husband by a carnal intercourse with the widow. It may be admitted that the arguments founded on this supposed analogy are in some measure confirmed by passages in several of the ancient treatises above referred to, and in particular by the Dattaka Mimamsa of Vidy Narainsamy, the author of the Madhavyam; but, as a ground for judicial decision, these speculations are inadmissible, though as explanatory arguments to account for an actual practice, they may be deserving of attention" (190).

Nor is it by any means unusual in a Hindu family to find the mother-in-law occupying a position of considerable power and importance Moreover, she was unquestionably the heir to the property in succession to the widow, after the failure of R's descendants. It, therefore, appears to their Lordships that in this state of the family the assent of the mother-in-law, and of the other persons who are proved beyond all question to have assented, was sufficient to legitimate the adoption (444 5). In this case the High Court held that an adoption with the assent of sapindas, which was otherwise valid, was invalid, because it was not made by the widow in the proper and bona fide performance of a religious duty. This conclusion was based on the ground that her object appeared to have been to hold the estate till her death, and then continue the line in the person of the adopted son.

———Motives of widow in making adoption—Consideration of, in determining its validity—Propriety of.

Purporting to rely upon the passage in 12 M.I.A. 397 at 442, the High Court held, in the case which went up on appeal to the Privy Council in 4 I.A. 1, that an adoption made by a Hindu widow with the assent of her husband's kindred, which adoption was otherwise valid, was invalid, because the learned judges thought " that it was not made out that there had been such an assent on the part of the kinsmen, as to shew, to quote the words of the judgment of the Privy Council in the Ramnad case, ' that the act was done by the widow in the proper and bona fide performance of a religious duty.' Her object appears to have been to hold the estate till her death, and then continue the line in the person of the plaintiff (adopted son)."

Their Lordships held that the High Court had misinterpreted the passage in the judgment in the Ramnad case (11).

Their Lordships give the correct interpretation of the passage in the judgment in the Ramnad case and state what they intended to lay down in the Ramnad case in the following passages:—The passage in question perhaps is not so clear as it might have been made. The passage is :— "It is not easy to lay down an inflexible rule for the case in which no father-in-law is in existence. Every such case must depend upon the circumstances of the family. All that can be said is, that there should be such evidence," not be it observed, of the widow's motives but "of the assent of kinsmen, as suffices to shew that the act is done by the widow in the proper and bona fide performance of a religious duty, and neither capriciously nor from a corrupt motive. In this case no issue raises the question that the consents were purchased and not bona fide attained" (13-4).

Their Lordships think it would be very dangerous to introduce into the consideration of these cases of adoption nice questions as to the particular motives operating on the mind of the widow, and that all which this committee in the former case intended to lay down was, that there should be such proof of assent on the part of the sapindas as should be sufficient to support the inference that the adoption was made by the widow, not from capricious or corrupt motives, or in order to defeat the interest of this or that sapinda, but upon a fair consideration by what may be called a family council, of the expediency of substituting an heir by adoption to the deceased husband (14). Where there are agnatic relations closely related to the deceased, their assent must be obtained, and the absence of their consent cannot be made good by the authorisation of distant relatives whose assent is more likely to be influenced by improper motives (102).

Where, however, a near sapinda is incapable of forming a judgment on the matter, being, say, a minor or a lunatic, his assent is neither sufficient nor necessary. So, where a near relative is clearly proved to be actuated by corrupt or malicious motives, his dissent may be disregarded. Again, where the nearest sapinda happens to be in a distant country, and it is impossible without great difficulty to obtain his consent, or where he is a convict or suffering a term of imprisonment, the absence of his consent may be disregarded. The consent required is that of a substantial majority of those agnates nearest in relationship who are capable of forming an intelligent and honest judgment on the matter.

Save in exceptional cases such as those mentioned above, however, the consent of the nearest sapindas must be asked, and if it is not asked, it is no excuse to say that they would certainly have refused (102-3). (Viscount Cave.) ADUSUMILLI KRISTNAYYA v. ADUSUMILLI LAKSHMIPATHI.

Inasmuch as the authorities in favour of the widow's power to adopt with the assent of her husband's kinsmen proceed in a great measure upon the assumption that his assent to this meritorious act is to be implied wherever he has not forbidden it, so the power cannot be inferred when a prohibition by the husband either has been directly expressed by him, or can be reasonably deduced from his disposition of his property, or the existence of a direct line competent to the full performance of religious duties, or from other circumstances of his family which afford no plea for a supercession of heirs on the ground of religious obligation to adopt a son in order to complete or fulfil defective religious rites (443). ——Prohibition of adoption by husband—Implication of, from his dispositions of property—Permissibility—Conditions.

It has been argued, however, that even if this adoption would have been regular, had Ramasamy died childless and intestate, his arzi relating to the management and descent of the zemindary contains an indication of his intention that his daughters and their descendants should be his successors and representatives, which ought to be taken to imply a virtual prohibition of the act of adoption by his widow. Their Lordships cannot accede to this argument. Ramasamy, no doubt, intended to be represented by his daughter's line, should that line continue. But he made no express provision for its failure, and the same reasons which justify a presumption of authority to adopt in the absence of express permission are powerful to exclude a presumptive prohibition to adopt, when on a new and unforeseen occasion the religious duty arises. His widow has not claimed a power to adopt, except on the happening of the contingency for which her husband omitted to provide. And her power so limited, not having been qualified by his disposition, must be determined by the general law (445). (*Sir James W. (N.B.—There has in recent years been considerable divergence of judicial opinion on the question whether an adoption by a Hindu widow is a spiritual rather than a temporal institution or a temporal rather than a spiritual institution and whether the question of reversionary interest ought to be imported into the determination of the question of the sufficiency of sapindas' assent. It has therefore been thought appropriate to collect in chronological order under this head all the passages bearing on the point.)

——The assent of kinsmen seems to be required by reason of the presumed incapacity of women for independence, rather than the necessity of procuring the consent of all those whose possible and reversionary interest in the estate would be defeated by the adoption. ——Where the deceased was a member of a joint Hindu family, and his father is not alive, the consent of all the brothers, who, in default of adoption, would take the deceased's share, would probably be required, since it would be unjust to allow the deceased's widow to defeat their interest by introducing a new co-parcener against their will (441-2). ——In considering the question of the requisite assent in the case of a divided family where no father-in-law is in existence their Lordships observe that with reference to such a case " It is not easy to lay down an inflexible rule. Every such case must depend upon the circumstances of the family. All that can be said is, that there should be such evidence ———In holding that the assent of the mother of the deceased was sufficient to legitimate the adoption Sir James W. ———In discussing the question as to whose assent would be required in the case of an adoption to a deceased member of a joint Hindu family where the particular property of the deceased was his separate property and whether the rule applicable to the normal case of an adoption to a member of an undivided family, viz., that the widow must obtain the assent of a member of that family and could not travel out of that undivided family, was inapplicable to such a case, their Lordships observed as follows:—A distinction which is founded on the nature of the property seems to belong to the law of property, and to militate against the principle that the validity of an adoption is to be determined by spiritual rather than temporal considerations, that the substitution of a son of the deceased for spiritual reasons is the essence of the thing, and the consequent devolution of property is a mere accessory to it (191-2). (Sir James W. Colvile.) SRI RAGHUNADHA v. SRI BROZO KISHORO. (1876) 3 I. A. 154 = 1 M. 69 (81-2) = 25 W. R. 291 = 3 Suth. 263 = 3 Sar. 583.

———Though it may be the duty of a Court of Justice administering the Hindu law to consider the effect of an adoption upon the devolution of property as a mere legal consequence and not as the essential foundation of the law of adoption, it is still impossible not to see that there are grave social objections to making the succession of property—and it may be in the case of collateral succession the rights of parties in actual possession—dependent on the caprice of a woman, subject to all the pernicious influences which interested advisers are too apt in India to exert over women possessed of, or capable of exercising dominion over property. It seems, therefore, to be the duty of the Courts to keep the power strictly within the limits which the law has assigned to it (193). (Sir James W. Colvile.) SRI RAGHUNADHA v. SRI BROZO KISHORO.

A. 1, 14) show clearly that rights to property cannot be left out of consideration in the determination of the question. In the latter case the Board observe as follows: "There should be such proof of assent on the part of the sapindas as should be sufficient to support the inference that the adoption was made by the widow not from capricious or corrupt motives, in order to defeat the interest of this or that sapinda, but upon a fair consideration of what may be called a family council of the expediency of substituting an heir by adoption to the deceased husband (273).

And an eminent Hindu lawyer, dealing with the question whose consent is requisite to the validation of an adoption when the husband is separate, remarks that an adoption is more a temporal than a spiritual institution, there being no spiritual reason for adoption if the deceased left a fraternal nephew, and that the requisites of a valid adoption are all temporal; therefore, the spiritual consideration should not be allowed to influence the judgment regarding the secular essential. ———Son dying unmarried—Widow succeeding as heir to—Adoption by—Validity—Dravida country.

According to the law prevalent in the Dravida country, a Hindu woman, not having her husband's permission, may, if duly authorised by his kindred, adopt a son to him. There is no reason why this general proposition should not apply to every case in which a widow might make an adoption under a written authority from her husband (10).

Where, therefore, a Hindu widow who had, on the death of her son under age and unmarried, succeeded to his estate, adopted a son to her husband with the assent of all the surviving sapindas of his family, held that the adoption was valid (10).

There is no ground for saying that because the estate descended to the son natural-born of the husband, and the widow of the latter took it as heiress of her son and not immediately from her husband, the adoption made by her, if otherwise valid, therefore became invalid (10). In the Mahratta country of the Presidency of Bombay and in Gujerat a Hindu widow, who is sole or joint heir to her husband's estate, may adopt a son to her deceased husband, without authority from her husband, and without the consent of his kindred, or of the caste or of the ruling authority, but she cannot adopt where her husband has expressly forbidden an adoption. There is no sound reason why the applicability of this rule should depend upon the question whether the widow's husband died as a separated or as an unseparated Hindu, or on the question whether the property which was vested in her when she made the adoption was or was not vested in her as his heir. If it was her religious duty to adopt a son to her husband, that duty would be the same in either case, although possibly the right of the adopted son to the property vested in the widow might be different (526).

Held, accordingly, that an adoption made by a widow on the death of a prior adopted son, a minor and unmarried, was valid. The result of an act of adoption by a Hindu widow is to divest the whole property from the mother and to vest it in her adopted son, because the property is in the widow from the death of the husband, till the power of adoption is exercised, and then that adoption divests it from the widow, and vests it in the adopted son (242). As, by the act of adoption, the property of the deceased would be divested from his widow and would vest in the adopted son as son and heir of the deceased, the regular course would be for the substitution by the widow of the adopted son's name for her own in the Revenue Collector's Books (358). NANDA PANDITA'S EXTENSION TO, OF RULE OF LEGAL MARRIAGE BEING POSSIBLE BETWEEN ADOPTER AND MOTHER OF ADOPTEE.

Nanda Pandita in the Dattaka Mimamsa extended to adoption by females the rule of Hindu law that no one can be adopted as a son whose mother the adopter could not have legally married. This extension of the rule by Nanda Pandita is not based upon the authority of any of the Smritis or institutes of sages; it is not supported by any text of the Dattaka Chandrika, or by any of the texts of the sages Saunaka and Sakala from which most of the rules of the Dattaka Mimamsa were deduced; and the extension has also not been accepted as the law in India, at least, so far as adoptions by widows to their deceased husbands are concerned (161-2). The rule of the Hindu law that a legal marriage must have been possible between the adopter and the mother of the adopted boy refers to their relationship prior to marriage (162). Though it may be the duty of a Court of Justice administering the Hindu law to consider the effect of an adoption upon the devolution of property as a mere legal consequence and not as the essential foundation of the law of adoption, it is still impossible not to see that there are grave social objections to making the succession of property—and it may be in the case of collateral succession the rights of parties in actual possession—dependent on the caprice of a woman, subject to all the pernicious influences which interested advisers are too apt in India to exert over women possessed of, or capable of exercising dominion over, property. It was contended that, by the adoption (by a Hindu widow) of one son, all the spiritual benefit to be derived from the act was secured to her deceased husband, and the adoption of a second boy was, therefore, supererogatory. This contention is disposed of by the judgment of Mitter, J. (in 22 W. R. 121):—An adopted son attaining an age of sufficient maturity and by performing the religious services enjoined by the shasters, cannot exhaust the whole of the spiritual benefit which a son is capable of conferring upon the soul of his deceased father; because these services are enjoined to be repeated at certain stated intervals, and the performance of them on each successive occasion secures fresh spiritual benefit to the soul of the deceased father. ———Son's widow—Vesting of estate in—Adoption after—Validity.

In 1811, G, being childless, executed a deed of permission to adopt by which he gave power to his wife, C, to adopt a son. He afterwards had a son, B, by his wife, C. In 1819, two years after his son's birth, and while he was living, G executed another deed of permission to adopt which permitted C, in the event of the death of B, to adopt a son, and, in the event of the death of that adopted son, to adopt other sons in succession, to avoid the extinction of the pinda. B, on coming of age, succeeded to the ancestral and other estate of his father who had died. On B's death, childless, his widow succeeded as heir to her deceased husband. Sometime after B's death, C, his mother, exercised the power given to her by the deed of 1819, by adopting a son to G. On a question arising as to the validity of the adoption made by C, Ram Kishore being the name of the adopted son, held that, when C professed to exercise the power given to her by the deed of 1819, the power was incapable of execution, and that the adoption of Ram Kishore was therefore invalid (307).

The deed of permission does not in express terms assign any limits to the period within which the adoption may be made. But it is plain that some limits must be assigned. It might well have been that B had left a son, natural-born or adopted, and that such son had died himself, leaving a son, and that such son had attained his majority in the lifetime of C. It could hardly have been intended that after the lapse of several successive heirs a son should be adopted to the great-grand-father of the last taker when all the spiritual purposes of a son, according to the largest construction of them, would have been satisfied (309-10).

In this case, B had lived to an age which enabled him to perform—and it is to be presumed that he had performed—all the religious services which a son could perform for a father. He had succeeded to the ancestral property as heir ; he had full power of disposition over it ; he might have alienated it ; he might have adopted a son to succeed to it if he had no male issue of his body. He could have defeated every intention which his father entertained with respect to property (310).

On the death of B, his wife succeeded as heir to him, and would have equally succeeded in that character in exclusion of his brothers, if he had had any. She took a vested estate, as his widow, in the whole of his property. It would be singular if a brother of B, made such by adoption, could take from his widow the whole of his property, when a natural-born brother could have taken no part. If Ram Kishore is to take any of the ancestral property, he must take all he takes by substitution for the natural-born son, and not jointly with him (310-1.) The estate of B, being unlimited, and he having married and left a widow as his heir, and that heir having acquired a vested estate in her husband's property as widow, a new heir cannot be substituted by adoption to G who is to defeat that estate, and take as an adopted son what a legitimate son of G, would not have taken (311).

An additional difficulty in holding the estate of the widow of B, to be divested may, perhaps, be found in the doctrine of Hindu law, that the husband and wife are one, and that as long as the wife survives, one-half of the husband survives ; but it is not necessary to press this objection (312). (Lord Kingsdown.) MUSSUMAT BHOOBUN MOYEE DEBIA v. RAM KISHORE ACHARJ CHOWDHRY. (1865) 10 M.I.A. 279 = 3 W.R.(P.C.) 15 = 1 Suth. 574 = 2 Sar. 111.

——The question is, whether the estate of the son of Gour Kishore being unlimited, and that son having married and left a widow as his heir, and that heir having acquired a vested estate in her husband's property as a widow, a new heir can be substituted by adoption who is to defeat that estate, and take as an adopted son what a legitimate son of Gour Kishore would not have taken. This seems contrary to all reason and to all the principles of Hindu Law (311). No case has been produced, no decision has been cited from the Text-Books, and no principle has been stated to show that by the mere gift of a power of adoption to a widow, the estate of the heir of a deceased son vested in possession, can be defeated and divested (312). (Lord Kingsdown) MUSSUMMAT BHOOBUN MOYEE DEBIA v. RAM KISHORE ACHARJ CHOWDHRY. (1865) 10 M.I.A. 279 = 3 W.R.(P.C.) 15 = 1 Suth. 574 = 2 Sar. 111.

——A Hindu having a legitimate son may authorise his widow to adopt a son in the event of his natural son dying under age and unmarried, and an adoption made by the widow in that event in pursuance of the authority would be valid, notwithstanding that the descent had been cast upon the natural-born son, unless the case fell within the authority of that of Chundrabullee (10 M. I. A. 279), in which it was decided that the son having died leaving a widow in whom the inheritance had vested, the mother could not defeat the estate which had so become vested by making an adoption, though in pursuance of a written authority from her husband (9). ——Held, that the decision in 10 M. I. A. 279 was that, upon the vesting of the estate in the widow of Bhawani (the son), the power of adoption (given by his father to his mother) was at an end, and incapable of execution, and that an adoption made after such vesting by the mother in pursuance of the power was therefore invalid for all purposes (245).

If the question had come before them without any previous decision upon it, their Lordships would have been of that opinion. The adoption intended by the deed of permission was for the succession to the Zemindary and other property, as well as the performance of religious services ; and the vesting of the estate in the widow of Bhawani, if not in Bhawani himself, as the son and heir of his father, was a proper limit to the exercise of the power (245). ——D. a Hindu, who was entitled to certain property, died, leaving widow, and also an only son, K, his heir-at law, surviving him. K, married and subsequently died without issue, leaving his widow, who, upon the death of her husband, succeeded as heir to the property. After the death of K, and during the lifetime of his widow, D's widow, with permission of sapindas, adopted a son to her deceased husband. The question was as to the validity of that adoption.

Held, that the survival of K's widow and the vesting of the estate in her put an end to the right of D's widow to adopt a son to him, and that the adoption was therefore invalid.

The case is governed by the decision of this committee in the case of Pudma Coomari Debi, which was founded upon the case of Mussumat Bhoobun Moyee Debea. The adoption, with the permission of sapindas in the present case could have no greater effect as regards the right to property than the adoption under the deed of permission in the abovementioned two cases. ——The Hindu Law no doubt recognises the validity of an authority given to a Hindu widow by her deceased husband to make a second, or, even a third or fourth adoption on failure of the previous adoption to attain the object for which the power is given, namely, the perpetuation of the deceased's line to discharge the obligations that rest on a pious Hindu. There is, however, a limit imposed by law to the period within which a widow can exercise a power of adoption conferred upon her, and when that limit is reached the power is at an end.

A, the widow of the last male holder of an impartible estate, who had authority from her husband to adopt a son to him, adopted B in 1870, acting on that authority. B held the estate until his death in 1906, leaving a widow, but no son.

Held, that a second adoption made by A, in 1907 under the terms of her husband's authority was invalid (160).

The succession of B, and his dying after attaining full legal capacity to continue the line either by the birth of a natural-born son or by the adoption to him of a son by his own widow would in themselves be sufficient to bring the limiting principle into operation, and so to have determined the authority of A. In a Ruffanamah, or deed of compromise, of a suit between three sons, members of a Hindu family, respecting the distribution of their father's estate, it was stipulated, that all "ancestral" property should be equally divided into four shares. Held, that the sense in which the word "ancestral" was employed was not confined to such property as the father had derived from his ancestors, but included " paternal " property, or such as had been acquired by the father by whatever title, and was possessed by him at the time of his decease.

" Ancestral, " as here used, is not confined to such property, if any, as the father had derived from his father, or from any ancestor. The word "ancestral" is here employed in the sense of "paternal," that is, as meaning property of the father, in whatsoever manner, or by whatsoever title, the father had acquired it. ———Mutation of names on death of father in favour of eldest son in respect of—Effect of—Exclusion of other sons merely by reason of.

On the death of the head of a joint Hindu family leaving 3 sons, the eldest of the sons applied under the provisions of Ss. 61 and 62 of the Oudh Land Revenue Act of 1876, praying that mutation of names in respect of his father's estate might be made in his favour. The Assistant Commissioner ordered that in place of the name of the deceased, the name of his eldest son should be entered as lambardar, and the names of the younger sons should be entered in place of the deceased as co-sharers. On appeal by the eldest son, the Deputy Commissioner modified the order of the Assistant Commissioner by canceiling so much of it as directed the registration of the names of the younger sons as co-sharers.

Held, that those proceedings afforded clear evidence that the eldest son took possession of the estate as property to which he was entitled to exclusive ownership, and not on behalf of his younger brothers, that he had sole legal possession in the sense that any person who on an application for mutation of names was put upon the registry as sole occupier would have sole legal possession, whether he was the head of a joint Hindu family, or not head of any family, or an absolute owner, but that they were not evidence that the eldest son was in possession as sole legal owner in a proprietary sense, to the exclusion of all claims of the other members of the family as co-owners or for maintenance or otherwise, and that the orders refused to above did not effect and were not intended to or designed to effect proprio vigore an exclusion of the younger sons from all interest in the property of the joint family of which they were members (227-8).

In the said proceedings the eldest son must not be held to have set up a claim to be sole proprietary owner of his father's estate, entitled to an interest in which his brothers had no claim. The revenue authorities had no jurisdiction to pronounce upon the validity of such a claim, and the orders in question did not attempt to do so (228). U and his four sons, the eldest of whom was one P, constituted a joint Hindu family. U appeared to have held, under different grants from the Raja of Benares, very extensive estates. Those estates, or a great part of them, were in his lifetime re-granted to his eldest son P. On a question arising between the sons inter se, the point for decision was whether the whole of what was granted to P, or a large portion of it, was to be treated as ancestral property. The court below appeared to have held that the mere circumstance of property which had been held by U, and, in some instances, by preceding members of his family, being afterwards transferred by a renewed grant in his lifetime to P, was not sufficient to evidence an hereditary interest, especially when the jumma or rent reserved to the Government, had from time to time varied, but that where the grant originally to U, was in terms which shewed that it was to continue in his family after his death, the property must be treated as ancestral.

———Settlement of, in name of eldest member of joint family—Effect of, on rights of other members—Joint enjoyment and exercise of equal rights by all—Proof of.

The question was whether a certain talook with accretions which, beyond all question, had been made by the investment of the profits of that estate, was an ancestral estate which descended to the plaintiffs-respondents and the defendant-appellant, who was a cousin, in co-parcenery.

It was proved that the talook in question was originally a Zemindary, of which the paternal grandfather of the parties was possessed. He had two sons, B, the father of the appellant, and S, the father of the respondents. The evidence showed that B, in the first Settlement, then in the Decennial Settlement, and then in the Perpetual Settlement, claimed to have it made with him by reason of his hereditary right to the Zemindary as hereditary Zemindar.

Held, it being proved that the property was the grandfather's property, and that B was entitled by descent, it followed, unless there was something to exclude it, that he would not be entitled to the property himself, but that he and his brother would succeed to it as coparceners. The fact that the Settlement was made in the name of the elder son, whether, originally, when he was a minor, or not,—the fact that he has continued to be solely registered from that time to this, affords no conclusive evidence against the title of the shareholder (547).

The mere fact that one of the two brothers was registered so as to be the proprietor to the outer world, does not seem to their Lordships to be of very great weight (547).

Where it further appeared that, in respect to the actual enjoyment of the property, there was beyond all question a continuous enjoyment by both the brothers upon equal terms, that the two lived together, that the families lived together, that they messed together, and that all the marriage and funeral ceremonies and other ceremonies of their religion were performed at the joint expense out of the income of the property, and apparently upon equal terms, and not as the bounty of an elder brother to a mere dependant who had no

It is undoubted that there were originally four classes of Hindoos: First, the Brahmins; second, the Khatris; third, the Vaisyas; fourth, the Soodras; the first three were the regenerate or twice-born classes, the latter the servile class (45). ALIENABILITY OF PROPERTY—CUSTOM AGAINST—EVIDENCE OF.

———Absence of instances of alienation—Value of.

The fact that there is no evidence of a sale of any portion of an impartible estate is, no doubt, in favour of a custom of inalienability, but that is not sufficient. The absence of evidence of an alienation, without any evidence of facts which would make it probable that an alienation would have been made, cannot be accepted as proof of a custom of inalienability (66). The fact that there has been no instance of a will purporting to dispose of a joint ancestral impartible estate is not by itself sufficient evidence of a custom restricting alienation by will (298).

The mere absence of any will is an equivocal circumstance. It might be attributable to an assumption on the part of the several Rajas that the law did not admit of a bequest of the Raj, or to the absence of any desire on their part so to dispose of the Raj (298). (Lord Warrington

APPLICABILITY OF.

———Aboriginal Bhuyias—Presumption in case of—Onus of Proof.

The suit related to the succession to an impartible estate, called the Lachmipur Raj, which appeard to be one of several which were comprised under the term, the 84 gaddis called Chowrasi. It was alleged that the clan or collection of families in question, and in particular the family in which the suit estate had heen held, were aboriginal Bhuyias ; and the question was whether in matters of succession they had retained their aboriginal customs, or had adopted Hindu law, in whole or in part, and specifically whether by law or custom the succession of an adopted son was excluded.

Held that, on the principle of the decisions in L.R. 12 I.A. 72, and L. R. 49 I. A. 119, 123, the proper inquiry was whether the family of the parties to the suit could be said to have become so far Hindu as to throw the burden of proof on the party alleging the custom, or whether the opposite conclusion should be come to, which would throw the burden on the party relying on the general Hindu law (62 4). ———Applicability of Hindu Law except where it is modified by custom—Admission in pleading of—What amounts to.

The plaint of the appellant (the plaintiff in the suit, stated that Jogendra Deb Raikat, the last possessor of the suit Baikunthpur estate, died on the 10th of March, 1878, without leaving any son of his body, and "therefore, according to the immemorial family custom and practice descending from generation to generation in our Raikat family of Baikunthpur and the Shastras, I have acquired an absolute title in all the properties left by him, and I am entitled to recover possession thereof." It then referred to a title by adoption, and under a will and agreement (angikar-patra) made by Jogendra Deb, which had been set up on behalf of the respondent, who was then a minor, but had since become of age and was the respondent, by the widow of Jogendra Deb. Then followed another paragraph, which said,—"According to the Kulachar (family custom) and custom prevailing in our Raikat family from very ancient times and descending from generation to generation, no one among the Raikats is competent to adopt or to alter the line of succession thereby, or by will or any other deed to give away the kingdom and the raj-guddi. According to the said immemorial kulachar, no female also is competent to hold property and the gaddi. Consequently the said Jogendra Deb Raikat is not, contrary to the above kulachar and custom, empowered to receive in adoption any one competent to hold the property, or to give or alienate the rajgi and the kingdom to the said adopted son or to any other person, either by will or agreement (angikarpatra) or by any other deed. In fact, the above will and agreement (angikar-patra) are contrary to the prevailing family custom, the law, and the Hindu Shastras, and are, indeed, not true."

It was contended by the counsel for the respondent that by the references in the plaint to the Shastras, the plaintiff admitted that the family was governed by the Hindu law, except where it was modified by custom.

Held, over-ruling the contention, that the meaning was to insist upon the family custom as being allowed by the Shastras to govern the family (78). (Sir Richard Couch.) FANINDRA DEB RAIKAT v. RAJESWAR DASS. (1885) 12 I. A. 72 = 11 C. 463 (472-3) = 4 Sar. 610.

It is true that an estate only becomes impartible by custom, and that the custom has in each case to be proved. But it is a custom which is usually found to exist where the estate belongs to a king or independent chief, or even a semi-dependent chief, of sufficient importance. The prince, to use a neutral term, regards the whole estate which his predecessor had as necessary for the support of his dignity or gaddi, giving appanages or maintenance to the junior members of the family. The custom of impartibility in such a case affords no indication whereby to determine that a family does not follow Hindu law as a whole. Reg. X of 1800, points to the frequency of this custom among Hindus in parts of Bengal. (Lord Phillimore.) SAHDEO NARAIN DEO v. KUSUM KUMARI. (1922) 50 I.A. 58 (68) = 2 P. 230 = A.I.R. 1923 P. It is beyond doubt that in some parts of Northern India, particularly in districts now in the Punjab or adjacent to the Punjab, the strict rules of the Mitakshara, as recognised by the School of Benares, have not been followed by some castes, tribes and families of Hindus, and that customs which are at variance with the law of the Mitakshara, as recognised by the School of Benares, have been for long consistently followed and acted upon, and when such customs are established they, and not the strict rules of the Mitakshara with which they are at variance, are to be applied. Such customs relate to a variety of subjects, as for instance to widows, adoptions, and the descent of lands and interest in lands; they are to be found principally amongst the agricultural classes, but they are also to be found amongst classes which are not agricultural (410). The evidence that the doctrine for which the respondents contend has been sanctioned by usage in the South of India consists partly of the opinions of Pundits, partly of decided cases. The decided cases are certainly not many. But there is at least the case G, and there are the French cases, which ought not to be wholly disregarded as recognitions of the law prevailing in the South of India. They are to be relied on in this case as affording evidence of a long continued series of opinions officially given, and judicially received, which were adopted as the grounds of decision, showing a continued and recognised existence of the doctrine (438, 439-40) (*Sir James W. Their Lordships nevertheless accepted the finding as binding between the parties to the suit and their representatives, but held that the case ought not to be considered a satisfactory precedent if in any future instance among other parties fuller evidence regarding the alleged custom of the Agarwalla Banias of Zira should be forthcoming (160). ———Quantum—England and India—Distinction.

Their Lordships have carefully considered the difficulty of applying all the strict rules that govern the establishment of custom in this country (England) to circumstances which find no analogy here. Custom binding inheritance in a particular family has long been recognised in India, although such a custom is unknown to the law of this country, and is foreign to its spirit. Customs affecting descent in certain areas or customs affecting rights of inhabitants of a particular district are perhaps the nearest analogies in this country. But in England, if a custom were alleged as applicable to a particular district and the evidence tendered in its support proved that the rights claimed had been enjoyed by people outside the district the custom would fail. This principle, however, it seems to their Lordships, ought not to be applied in considering such a custom as the one claimed here, since, if the custom were in fact well established in one particular family, whether it was enjoyed or no by another family, would not affect the question, since the custom might be independent in each case, and the evidence would not establish that the custom failed by reason of the inability to define the exact limits within which it was to be found when once it was established that, within certain and defined limits, it undoubtedly existed (14). ———Delegation by father of, to his son—Validity—Brother—Appointment by, to raise a son to his father—Validity—Effect.

It certainly requires positive law or evidence of a custom from which the law may be presumed, that, supposing the rule still to exist that a father may appoint a daughter for the purpose of raising a son to him, it is a part of it that he may delegate the appointment to his sons. There is nothing said of that power to delegate being a part of the law, but, on the contrary, the rules as to the manner of appointment given in the old authorities point to the act proceeding personally from the father. The law as to adoption of sons bears an analogy to this, but the usages of that law cannot, without authority, be imported into this mode of appointment. These adoptions must stand upon the authority relating to each. In this case there was no formal appointment by the father himself in his lifetime, and no sufficient authority has been cited to establish that what was done afterwards can have the effect of making the son of the daughter, who appears to have been married with the consent of her brother upon the condition that the husband should live in the house, equal for the purposes of succession to the son of a son (167-8).

In this case what the plaintiff (appellant) who claimed to be the son of an appointed daughter of his maternal grandfather alleged was that his maternal uncle, agreeably to the counsel of his father (i.e., the maternal grandfather), having given in marriage the plaintiff's mother, kept her under his roof, declaring and giving her hopes that if a son was born to her such son would stand in the relation of son's son to his mother's father, and that if at any time occasion arose, he would observe the religious rites of Sraddh, and keep the estate intact; and that accordingly the plaintiff, from the day of his birth to the date of suit lived with his maternal uncle in common for all the purposes of board, lodging, and worship (166). ———Importation into, of usages of law adoption—Propriety.

The law as to adoption of sons bears an analogy to this (the appointment of a daughter to raise a son), but the usages of that law cannot, without authority, be imported into this mode of appointment. These adoptions must stand upon the authority relating to each (167-8).

The above observation was made in connection with the question whether a father can validly delegate to his sons the appointment of a daughter to raise a son to himself (the father.) (Sir Montague E. Smith.) THAKOOR JEEBNATH SINGH v. COURT OF WARDS.

(1875) 2 I.A. 163 = 15 B. L. R. 190 = 3 Sar. 490 = 23 W. R. 409 = 3 Suth. 142.

The plaintiff (appellant) alleged that his mother's father, S, appointed his daughter to raise a son to him, who should stand in the place of son's son; and he contended that, by the rule of Hindu law, he, as the son of a daughter so appointed, was entitled to succeed in preference to more distant male relatives. The question for decision was whether the plaintiff brought himself within that rule.

The plaint said this: "Your petitioners' maternal uncle, L, agreeably to the counsel of his father. S, having given in marriage your petitioner's mother, kept her under his roof, declaring and giving her hopes that if a son be born to her such son will stand in the relation of son's son to his mother's father, and that if at any time occasion arise, he will observe the religious rites of Sraddh (obsequies), and keep the estate intact; and accordingly your petitioner, from the day of his birth to the present moment lived with the deceased Maharajahs (S and L) in common for all the purposes of board, lodging, and worship."

The plaintiff's attempt was to bring himself within the description of son of an appointed daughter.

The evidence of the authority supposed to have been given by S, to his sons, and of the exercise of it by them, was most vague and unsatisfactory. No more appeared respecting the supposed exercise of it by the sons, than that when their sister married a condition was imposed upon the husband that they should live in her brother's house, and the son be brought up as one of his. No ceremonies were proved to have been performed, nor any express form of appointment used.

Held, that the evidence was wholly insufficient to establish a formal appointment which was to have the serious consequences of altering the line of succession (167-8). (Sir

Supposing the old rule of Hindu Law that a daughter may be specially appointed to raise a son and that a son of a daughter so appointed is entitled to succeed in preference to more distant male relations exists in modern times and is not obsolete, inasmuch as it breaks in upon the general rules of succession, whenever an heir claims to succeed by virtue of that rule, he must bring himself very clearly within it (166). The leading passage is in Menu, Ch. 9, S. 127 ; and it is as follows : " He who has no son may appoint his daughter in this manner to raise up a son for him, saying, 'the male child who shall be born from her in wedlock shall be mine for the purpose of performing my obsequies.'" The passages in the Mithakshara are to the same effect. In Chap. 1, S. 11, cl. 3 : " The son of an appointed daughter is equal to him,—that is, equal to the legitimate son. The term signifies son of a daughter. Accordingly, he is equal to the legitimate son, as described by Vasishta,—'This damsel, who has no brother, I will give unto thee decked with ornaments : the son who may be born of her shall be my son . . . . .' Still she is only similar to a legitimate son, for she derives more from the mother than from the father. Accordingly, she is mentioned by Vasishta as a son, but as third in rank." Then the note to that is,—" The putrica-putra is of four descriptions ; the first is the daughter appointed to be a son ; she is so by stipulation to that effect. The next is her son. He obtains, of course, the name of a son of an appointed daughter, without any special compact. This distinction, however, occurs : he is not in place of a son, but in place of a son's son, and is a daughter's son,"—that is, the son of a daughter who is herself appointed to be in the place of a son. Then there is this : "The third description of son of an appointed daughter is the child born of a daughter who was given in marriage with an express stipulation in this form. The child which shall be born of her shall be mine for the purpose of performing my obsequies" (166-7). (Sir Montague E. Smith.) THAKOOR JEEBNATH SINGH v. COURT OF WARDS. (1875) 2 I. As regards the married daughters of a deceased Hindu, who became entitled to their father's property after their mother's death, there is no presumption that the possession of that property by the surviving members of their father's joint family (Bengal) is not adverse to them. On the death of M, a Hindu, his daughter-in-law, S, sued A, (M's daughter), and a collateral of M, to establish a will alleged by S to have been executed by M and praying that possession should be given to her of one-third share of the property left by him. That suit was settled by a compromise by which a portion of the property of M, was delivered by the defendants to S, and the remainder of the property was divided into moieties, each of the defendants taking a moiety.

M and the collateral were in fact separate and not joint, and that fact was known to the collateral at the time of the compromise. The compromise was, however, based on the assumption that there was a question as to whether there had been a separation between the two lines of the family. There was no evidence to show that A entered into the compromise from ulterior motives with full knowledge of the false nature of the collateral's claim and that, in assenting to

She therefore stood in need of especial protection. But she acted entirely under the advice and influence of the collateral who knew the false nature of his claim.

Held, in a suit brought by the sons of A, against the representatives in interest of the collateral, that as against them the plaintiffs had established the invalidity of the compromise after their mother's death. DECREE FOR OR AGAINST—RES JUDICATA AGAINST REVERSIONERS.

———Shivagunga case—Rule in—Applicability.

In the judgment of this Committee in the Shivagunga case it is said, with reference to an adverse decree in a suit brought by a Hindu widow for possession of a Zemindary as heir to her husband, that if it had become final in her lifetime it would have bound those claiming the Zemindary in succession to her; and unless it could be shown that there had not been a fair trial of the right in that suit, or in other words, unless that decree could have been successfully impeached on some special ground, it would have been an effectual bar to any new suit by any person claiming in succession to the widow. The principle of that decision applies equally to an adverse decree in a suit brought by a Hindu daughter for possession of property as heir to her father (191-2.) ———Daughter's right to succeed to father's estate by—Preference—Benares School — Indigent childless widowed daughter—Wealthy married daughter with children.

A Hindu governed by the law of the Benares School died leaving two daughters. One of them, the plaintiff, was a childless widow, dependent upon and living with her father at the time of his death, whilst defendant, the other daughter, was living with her husband, a man of some substance, by whom she had had children, living at date of suit.

In a suit by the plaintiff seeking, as between herself and the defendant, to be declared the preferential heir of their father, held that the plaintiff, as compared with her sister, was an indigent; or, in the words of the Mithakshara, "an unprovided daughter," and that the plaintiff, though a childless widow, was entitled to succeed in preference to the defendant (46).

The statement to the following effect in Sir William Macnaghten's Principles and Precedents of Hindu Law is a correct exposition of the law:—According to the Benares School a maiden is in the first instance entitled to the property; failing her, the succession devolves on the married daughters who are indigent, to the exclusion of the wealthy daughters; in default of indigent daughters, the wealthy daughters are competent to inherit; but no preference is given to a daughter who has, or is likely to have, male issue, over a daughter who is barren or a childless widow (46). Quære, how such a custom would operate in cases in which an owner died leaving no relation but a daughter who could inherit.

The suit was by the only son of a daughter of R to recover R's properties from the defendants, who represented R's brothers.

R died without a son, leaving a widow and three daughters. The widow succeeded to his share of the property, and died. At her death, one of the three daughters was a childless widow and was therefore not entitled to succeed to her father's property. The other two daughters, plaintiff's mother and one N, were married daughters and succeeded to their father's property. Subsequently thereto, but before the institution of the suit, N also became a childless widow. She was living when the suit was commenced.

The title upon which the plaintiff relied in his plaint was, that in consequence of N's becoming a childless widow after the death of his grandmother and during the lifetime of his mother, who had died before suit, all the property accrued to his mother according to the shasters.

Held, that the plaintiff's contention was untenable (124).

The right to inherit vested in N jointly with the plaintiff's mother, her sister, upon the death of their mother; for at that time she and her sister (plaintiff's mother) were two young married women, likely to have sons; and it is clear that, according to the Hindu law, the right once vested in a daughter by inheritance does not cease until her death, notwithstanding she become barren, or a widow who has not borne a son. On the death of the daughter of the last male holder of an impartible estate, the question was as to who was entitled to succeed to the same. The respondent was the eldest surviving grandson of the istimrar zemindar by a daughter of his second wife. The appellant was the grandson of the istimrar zemindar by a daughter of his third wife. The respondent contended that, the estate being impartible and being therefore capable of being enjoyed by only one person at a time, he, as the eldest surviving grandson, was entitled.

Held, that, if the estate was impartible, the respondent was entitled to it as sole heir of the istimrar zemindar (109). (Sir Arthur Hobhouse.) MUTTUVADUGANADHA TEVAR v. DORASINGA TEVAR. (1881) 8 I. A. 99 = 3 M. 290 (300) = 4 Sar. 239.

———Liability for, of sons, grandsons and great-grandsons—Basis and extent of—Original Hindu law—Law as established by British Indian Courts.

The Hindu lawyers appear to have made a difference in the obligations resting upon sons, grandsons and great-grandsons. The son was bound to discharge the ancestral debt as his own, principal and interest, whether he received any assets or not from the ancestor. The grandsons had to discharge the debt without interest and the great grandson's liability arose only if he received any assets from the ancestor. The British Indian Courts have held that the son and grandson are not liable for any debt unless they receive assets and that the obligations of each of them, sons and grandsons, are co-extensive. That rule extends equally to grandsons and great-grandsons. (211-2). (Mr. Ameer Ali.) MASIT—ULLAH v. DAMODAR PRASAD.

———Brothers—Division of maternal grandfather's property—Arrangement for—Proof of.

The suit was brought by one G, for a declaration of his proprietary right and possession of a large quantity of land in a Zemindari, and to set aside an order of the Collector which was against his possession. The title set up by him was, that he was one of two brothers, his brother being B, who died in 1850; that he was joint in property with B, that upon B's, death, leaving two sons, his estate went to those two sons and that he, G, then became joint with them; upon their both dying without issue the whole estate devolved on him. He brought his action against, inter alia, the appellant, the widow of one of the sons of B. Her case was that B, and G, were separate; that the whole of the property in question belonged to B, the plaintiff having no interest therein, but acting only as manager; that consequently it descended to the sons of B; and that she as the widow of the survivor was entitled to the property. That was the issue between the parties. The defendant alleged that S, who died in the year 1800, shortly before his death, adopted his grandson, B, then a young child, and that by that adoption B obtained the whole of the property. The plaintiff denied the adoption; he further contended that no such adoption could have been legally made, and asserted that B, soon after or about the time when he became of age, entered into possession of the property of his grandfather by the permission of the widow of the grandfather and his own mother, who certainly would have taken before him, and that he in point of fact was in possession; that the plaintiff, his younger brother, who was born some ten years after him, making a claim to the property, he and B, after some dispute between them, came to an arrangement which was embodied in an agreement dated 4-1-1835, whereby they shared the property equally between them, B's name alone being entered in the register as the owner. The question was whether that agreement was made out.

Held, on the evidence affirming the High Court, that there was a very strong case on behalf of G, that there had been some arrangement between the brothers, and that he had been in possession of the estate for such a space of time as would throw on the defendant a burden of proof that he was wrongfully in possession, which she had altogether failed to discharge (461). ———Compromise in nature of—Binding character of, on the parties and their representatives

Disputes having arisen respecting the marriage of A, a Hindu, the two sons of A, each claiming to be legitimate, the one against the other as illegitimate, to avoid litigation, they entered, with the surviving widow of A, into a family arrangement and compromise to the effect, that the sons were to be equally entitled in moieties of A's estate, provision being made for maintenance to the widow, but the division was not to take effect until the youngest son was of age. No actual partition took place, and the youngest son predeceased his brother, who died in possession. Both sons left widows, but no male issue. Held, that the compromise was binding on the sons, and the widows claiming under them.

Whatever effect this transaction might have as against heirs of the common ancestor, after the death of the widow, it bound her and the sons, and all claiming under them (513). ———Estate taken under—Absolute or limited--Will bequeathing village in equal moieties to two legatees—Compromise in 1869 between legatees and testator's widow giving entire village to one of legatees—Writing—Necessity—Validity of compromise—Estate conveyed under it.

By his will, dated 6th December, 1864, N gave his Zamindari and all his other property to his two wives. To J and S, he gave the village of V, in perpetuity. The testator gave three other villages to S's son.

Neither J, nor S, took any steps to obtain possession of the village, V, on the testator's death. There was no opposition on the part of N's widows, nor was there any unwil lingness on their part to carry out the testator's wishes. But J, considered that he had not been fairly treated by the testator, who had made a more liberal provision for the family of S, and so he refrained from accepting the bequest in his favour in the hope that N's widows would increase it. In the meantime the village remained part of the Zamindari and the rents were received by or on behalf of N's widows and went into their treasury.

In 1869, S, being then dead, and his son having succeeded to his rights, the family differences were composed. It was arranged that the entirety of the village of V, should be made over to J, as from the commencement of the current year with the consent of S's son, who was to receive satisfaction for his moiety from N's widows.

That arrangement was come to on 22nd January, 1869. In pursuance of it an order dated the same day, was addressed by S's son to the amildar directing him to make over the management of the village to the person sent by J, on behalf of his master. The order so far as it went was consistent with an absolute interest in the person in whose favour it was issued. There was not a word in it cutting down J's interest to a life interest, or to a tenancy at will, or imposing any terms as the condition of his continuing to hold the village.

On a question arising as to the character or capacity in which J held the village while he was in possession, whether he was absolute owner, or was only tenant for life, or tenant at will, or grantee upon certain conditions for the breach of which he was liable to be dispossessed, or merely manager under a revocable appointment, held that, as J took an absolute estate in the moiety of the village under the will of N, the effect of the arrangement of 1869 was that he was to hold the entire village in the same way as he was entitled to hold his own moiety, and that his interest in the two moieties should be commensurate (91).

Such a transaction would be perfectly good as a family arrangement. J was put in possession of the whole, and as the law then stood no writing was necessary to vest S's moiety in him (91). (Lord Macnaghten). RAJA VELLANKI VENKATA RAMA RAO v. RAJA PAPAMMA RAO.

———Impartible Estate—Junior member—Release of all interest in estate by, on receipt of allotment for maintenance—Family arrangement effecting—Binding nature of—Custom of family—Arrangement purporting to be in accordance with—Effect.

The respondent, the appellant, and another, were brothers, the appellant being the eldest son. Their family owned an estate called "Nad Gowdki," Gowdki Enam, Government land and Houses in several villages. The respondent sued for a partition of the estate and for the recovery of his share thereof. The appellant alleged a family custom by which the younger sons were excluded from inheritance and were entitled only to maintenance. The appellant also relied upon a deed of release executed by the respondent in his favour nearly ten years before suit.

That deed of release recited that it was customary in the family for grants for maintenance to be allowed for junior members, that in pursuance of the custom the respondent asked for land for the support and maintenance of his family, and that the appellant gave him for maintenance the land and houses described in the deed. The deed provided that as the appellant had given the respondent land and houses for maintenance, the respondent was not to be liable for any debts contracted by their ancestors and by the appellant, that the appellant was solely to be entitled to and liable for the debts, that he was to be solely entitled to the family estate and rights and privileges, and that the respondent was to have no manner of claim to them, nor the appellant to the land and houses allotted to the respondent.

The respondent entered into possession of the allotted property and remained in possession till 1861, the date of the suit, without any complaint on his part except that the portion allotted to him by way of maintenance was too small, which complaint was met by a further portion being allotted to him for the purpose of increased maintenance.

Held that the deed of release, if not open to challenge on the ground of fraud, or upon any other ground, would be given effect to as a family arrangement, followed, as it had been, by enjoyment and possession for a period of 10 years (37).

AURASA SON—GIFT TO A PERSON DESCRIBED AS AN—DONEE NOT IN FACT SUCH—EFFECT OF.

———Persona designata—Gift if to donee as a.

On February 16, 1889, the then Raja of Pittapur made a will, whose terms were: "Though it is not specially necessary according to Hindu law that (property) should be passed to the aurasa son by means of a will I have written this will to declare my opinion to all people that I have according to Hindu Law passed the property to my aurasa son without (property) being disturbed. It is hereby settled that my entire property should go to my aurasa son Venkata Surya and that cash (allowance) settled already to be paid to my adopted son Ramakrishna should continue to be paid."

On September 7, 1889, the Raja made another will, by which after saying it had been his intention to give all his moveable and immoveable property to his aurasa son (again naming him) he gave him his self-acquired properties and other immoveable property which he had got under a will, and also the whole of his moveable property. On March 17, 1890, he made another will, by which he confirmed the gifts to his aurasa son and the allowance to the adopted son.

Held, on a construction of the will, that there was a gift to Venkata Surya, though he was not the aurasa son of the Raja, and that the false description of him as aurasa son did not vitiate the gift. ———Leake v. Robinson—Rule in.

The will of a childless Hindu, after giving his mother and wife possession of his property for their lives, provided as follows:—"On the death of my mother and my wife, the sons of my sisters, that is to say, those sons who are now in existence, as also those who may be born hereafter, shall, in equal shares, hold the said property in possession and enjoyment by right of inheritance."

Held, that the devise in favour of the testator's nephew, alive at the time of his death, was valid, and was not invalidated, because it could not operate in favour of nephews then unborn.

It was contended that the gift, including, as it did, a gift to persons not in existence at the time of the testator's death was altogether void. In their Lordships' opinion the question was set at rest for all practical purposes by the judgment of Wilson, J., in 12 Cal. 663. In that case the learned Judge showed that the rule commonly referred to as the rule in Leake v. Robinson was introduced into India owing to a mistaken analogy and stated that he should be "prepared to hold as the general rule that where there is a gift to a class, some of whom are or may be incapacitated from taking because not born at the date of gift or the death of the testator as the case may be and where there is no other objection to the gift, it should enure for the benefit of those members of the class who are capable of taking." ———Case of—Finding of gift of corpus with reservation in favour of interest—Propriety.

Where a party to a suit puts forward the case of an out and out gift of immoveable property in his favour and neither alleges nor proves that the gift was a gift of the corpus of the property subject to a reservation in favour of the interest, it is hardly proper for the court to find that the gift was of the corpus only subject to a reservation in favour of the interest and to give judgment accordingly (10).

It is hardly right to invent a new case when the judgment comes to be delivered. (Lord Hobhouse.) NAWAB IBRAHIM ALI KHAN v. UMMAT-UL-ZOHRA.

———Case of, in pleadings and in Indian Courts—Privy Council appeal—Contract to make gift—Change of case into—Permissibility.

The suit was for the recovery of certain jewels mentioned in the plaint and the decree sought was delivery of the jewels or payment of their value conformably to S. 208 of C. P. Code of 1882, which deals with a suit for delivery of specific moveables on the ground of property. The plaintiff alleged that the said jewels were gifted to her by her deceased great-aunt and that she had thereby become the owner of the same; the cause of action was alleged to have arisen, when the Receiver of the estate of the deceased took possession of the said jewels.

The Courts in India found against the gift alleged. On appeal to the Privy Council, the plaintiff suggested that there was an enforceable contract by the deceased to make a gift of the said jewels to her and that she was entitled to recover on the basis of that contract. There was no trace, however, of contract, as a possible cause of action, in the pleadings, the issues, the evidence, or the judgments, for in India the issue was gift, not contract.

Held that, in view of the long duration of the suit and the lack of finality in any decree that would at that stage be possible, the change of front could not be permitted, and that the plaintiff's contention must fail.

The argument now advanced is contradictory of the case made in the courts below, and involves a line of attack that the defendants had no opportunity to meet, while the litigation was in the lower courts, where appropriate evidence could have been adduced. The case is essentially one where the observation of Lord Westbury in 11 M. I. A. 7 should be strictly applied, viz., "It is impossible to conclude parties by inferences of fact which are not only not consistent with the allegations that are to be found in the plaint, which constitute the case that the defendant has to meet, but which are in reality contradictory of the case made by the plaintiff." The suit was to recover possession of certain zemindari lands which had been conveyed by the 1st plaintiff to the defendants by a registered deed of gift, subject to the payment of a maintenance allowance of Rs. 2,000 a year for the benefit of the 1st plaintiff himself, of his two stepmothers, one of whom was the 2nd plaintiff, and of his wife, the third plaintiff, and subject to the condition that on any failure to pay the allowance the deed should become null and void.

The Sub-Judge found that the defendants had never paid anything to the second and third plaintiffs, and that though they might have paid something to, and incurred certain expenses, for, the 1st plaintiff, for a few years after the deed, they never paid him anything thereafter for a period of 7 years, and that there had been a clear violation of the conditions. The Appellate Court agreed with the Sub-Judge, and found further that the condition as regards the payment of Rs. 2,000 annually was never complied with and that the defendants had no justification for withholding it. They accordingly made a decree for possession with mesne profits.

A Hindu died leaving him surviving a widow, a daughter and an adopted son. Shortly before his death he executed a deed which was in these terms : "I am proprietor of one-third share of the whole 16 annas" of certain mouzahs "which I inherited from my forefathers. Whereas no son is born to me except one daughter, by name S, whom I have reared up like my son, and have still got in my house, and not allowed to go to her husband's house, and as on account of my dotage I have given up all hopes of my existence, consequently, in order to evade all future disputes I have made a partition in this wise : that a one-third share out of the whole 16 annas of mouzah Musli with dakhili, Rs. 1100 in cash, and Bhichuck slave with his children, I have granted to S, my daughter, for her maintenance, in order that she may enjoy possession of the same with her children, as proprietress, and thus pass her days."

———Male heirs—Gift to daughter for her life and after her death to her—Effect of—Independent gift to male heirs—Words "male heirs" words of inheritance or of gift.

On 1st May, 1889, J, a Hindu dwelling in Bombay, in consideration of the natural love and affection which he bore to "his children and grandchildren," made a voluntary settlement in their favour of property chiefly consisting of real estate. The children named as beneficiaries were four, Krishnabai, Pootlabai, Raghunath, and Kashibai, all of whom were married and had children living at the date of the deed, while Raghunath had both children and grandchildren. The settlement took the form of a conveyance of property to trustees upon trust to pay the income, after deducting Rs. 25 per month for taxes and repairs, to the settlor for life, and, after his death, then upon certain trusts expressed in the following words :—

" Upon trust out of the said rents, dividends and profits to pay one-fourth part of the net amount to Raghunath during his life and from and after the decease of the said Raghunath in trust to pay the same to all the male heirs of the said Raghunath share and share alike and as to one-quarter of the said rents, dividends and profits upon trust to pay the same to Krishnabai during her life for her sole and separate use and after her death in trust for the male heirs of the said Krishnabai share and share alike."

J, the settlor, died in July, 1894. Krishnabai died in 1897, leaving six sons, all of whom were living at the date of the settlement. The dispute arose in relation to her share, the contention of the heirs of the settlor being that the limitations in favour of her male heirs after her death were contrary to Hindu Law and void, and that in consequence there was a resulting trust in favour of the settlor.

Held, that the true interpretation of the deed was that the persons who answered the description of male heirs at the date of Krishnabai's death were the persons in whose favour an independent gift was made, but that by operation of the Hindu Law there would be excluded from that class people who were not living when the deed was executed, and that the estate so conferred upon those persons was an absolute estate.

It was argued that the words " the male heirs of Krishnabai after Krishnabai's death " themselves connoted a descendible quality of estate with which it was the intention of the settlor to impress the property either in the gift to Krishnabai or to the male heirs. Their Lordships are unable to accept this view, which is permeated by the suggestion that the words when used in a Bombay settlement are primarily words of inheritance denoting the character of an estate. They do not think that the male heirs of Krishnabai took by inheritance from her. They are of opinion that the estate that Krishnabai took was defined and limited by her life-interest, and that it was not by descent from her but by virtue of a wholly independent gift that her male heirs were beneficiaries under the deed. The words " male heirs " are not words of inheritance, but are words of gift. (Lord Buckmaster). MADHAVRAO GANPATRAO DESAI v. RAGHUNATH AGASKAR. (1927) 55 I. A. 74 = 52 B. 176 = 47 C. L. In 1868 the then owner of the Bettia Raj made a verbal gift of a mouzah appertaining to the Raj to his daughter on the occasion of her marriage with the appellant. The daughter died without issue, and thereupon the respondent, who succeeded to the Raj on the death of the donor, sued to recover possession of the mouzah from the appellant, alleging that it was given to the deceased daughter, subject to the condition that, if she should happen to die without issue, it should revert to the Raj, and that, therefore, the mouzah had reverted to the Raj. The appellant, on the other hand, asserted that the mouzah was given to him, for the benefit of his wife and himself, and that, even if the gift was to his wife, it was not subject to the condition alleged.

In June, 1883, the donor executed an ikrarnamah, by which, after reciting that the mouzah in question had been given to his daughter by way of Kohincha gift at the time of her marriage, but that no deed had been drawn up, the donor purported to convey the mouzah to his daughter by way of Kohincha gift "with the same conditions as before," to hold possession and enjoy the income, but without power of alienation, subject, however, to the provision that, in the event of her dying without issue, the property should revert to him and after him to his heirs.

The High Court found that there was no ground for impeaching the ikrarnamah, and, on the strength of that document and the facts and circumstances of the case, held that the gift was subject to the condition alleged by the respondent.

Their Lordships affirmed the High Court, observing:—The ikrarnamah of the 15th of June, 1883, if not a fraudulent deed, is decisive of the case. ———Propriety.

In a suit brought by the plaintiff against M, the plaintiff's case was that a deed of gift executed by M, in favour of her daughter, the plaintiff's deceased wife, was a present absolute gift of the property conveyed by it to his wife. M's defence, which was upheld by their Lordships, was that the deed was intended to be operative so far as to convey the property after her death, and that there was, at the time of its execution, an agreement that for her life she was to have the beneficial interest, and her daughter was to hold benami for her. She did not allege that the deed was a fraud against the creditors, and was therefore altogether void or inoperative. The plaintiff did not either set up any such case as that the deed was fraudulent, and that therefore M, was estopped from disputing it.

Held, differing from the High Court, that, as between the parties to the suit, the issue did not arise as to whether the deed was fraudulent against the creditors, nor whether it was absolutely colorable and void. It was contended that what is said in the books on Hindu Law about the completion of a gift by possession is founded on a public policy relating to land and analogous to the feudal rule requiring investiture or livery of seisin. But the texts relate to moveables as well as to land; and, with one not very clear exception, they relate to intended gifts which it is contemplated that the donor may take back until they are perfected. They appear to rest on a principle which has nothing to do with the feudal rules, and the European analogy to which is rather to be found in the cases relating to voluntary contracts or transfers, where, if the donor has not done all he could to perfect his contemplated gift, he cannot be compelled to do more (232-3). ——Validity—Donor affirming gift—Possession of property—Donee's right to, as against party claiming adversely to donor and donee.

Under the Hindu Law, a gift is not invalid on the ground that the donor was out of possession, and that no possession was given to the donee (229).

Where the donor was a party to a suit for possession brought by the donee and he affirmed the validity of the gift, but its validity was disputed by a person who claimed adversely to the donor and the donee, held, that the gift was valid, and that the donee was entitled to possession if the deed of gift conferred upon him a right to possession.

If the gift were to a man and his heirs to be selected from a line other than that specified by law, expressly excluding the legal course of inheritance, as, for instance, if an estate were granted to a man and his eldest nephew, and the eldest nephew of such eldest nephew, and so forth, for ever to take as his heirs, to the exclusion of all other heirs, and without any of the persons so taking having the power to dispose of the estate during his lifetime; here, inasmuch as an inheritance so described is not legal, such a gift cannot take effect except in favour of such persons as could take under a gift to the extent to which the gift is consistent with the law. The first taker would, in this case, take for his lifetime, because the giver had at least that intention. He could not take more, because the language is inconsistent with his having any different inheritance from that which the gift attempts to confer, and that estate of inheritance which it confers is void (66). out by the Government to talookdars, desiring to know who were their successors, the donor followed the not uncommon course of making what was called a will by way of pointing out to the Government who the successor was. In that will she stated that certain persons had rights, but she at the same moment asserted her own right of altering those dispositions if she pleased. Among those rights were the four villages held by the donee.

Held, that the evidence afforded by the will was not without bearing upon the donor's right to resume (136-7)

Thus we have stated on the face of a formal document put in for the purpose of informing the Government of the state of the donor's talook that the talookdar then claimed the entire right of altering the disposition of these very four villages. Such evidence is by no means conclusive, and under some circumstances it might be worthless, or even inadmissible. In order that you may perform those religious ceremonies, celebrate the festivals satisfactorily, and may provide for your own support, by having the property under your authority and control, I put a stop to my interest (in those taluqs) and withdraw my enjoyment thereof, and I make them over to you, with this promise, that you may remove my name from the collector's sherista in respect of the taluqs named in the schedule, and you may have your name substituted for it; that you should have undisputed possession in the mofussil; that you should take the lowajima papers and the arrears of rent from the amlas and officers appointed by me; that you should appoint men who are under your control to the offices of amlas, and through them you should collect rents from the tenants in the mofussil; that you should perform the above-mentioned sebas, and should provide for your support. I have no right or claim to the taluqs. If I advance any claim at any future time, such claim should be rejected. I have nothing to do with the profits and loss of the taluks. You can not claim anything from me. I have no claim against you."

Held, on the construction of the ikrarnama, that the indefinite words of the gift must be limited by the purpose of the gift, and that it was the intention of the executant that R should take the property only for her life (228).

In this case the intention must be collected from the whole of the instrument. The words, "I put a stop to my interest (in those talooks), and withdraw my enjoyment thereof, and I make them over to you," must be read in connection with the words which precede them,—"In order that you may perform those religious ceremonies, celebrate the festivals satisfactorily, and may provide for your own ———Trust upon notes for idols—Impressing of—Proof of—Pencil writing on notes indicating trust in hands of donee—Sufficiency of.

GOVERNMENT NOTES—GIFT OF.

The question was whether four Government notes given by M to the defendant, S, were impressed with a trust for certain idols, as alleged by the plaintiffs. In support of their case the plaintiffs relied upon writing in pencil upon those notes—upon the face of three of them, and on the back of one of them—indicating that S took the notes in trust as shebait for the idols.

Held that it was somewhat dangerous to affix a trust of that description, whereby property was permanently alienated from useful purposes to mortmain, upon such evidence (212).

Held further that, inasmuch as it appeared that the pencil writings upon the notes were not in the handwriting of M, and no evidence was given that they were written by any person authorised either by him or by the defendant, S, or when they were written, it would not be right to reverse the decision of the High Court, which was to the effect that, assuming all the documents relied upon by the plaintiffs to be genuine, nevertheless it had not been proved with the requisite certainty that those notes were endorsed by M to S impressed with the trust alleged by the plaintiffs (212). ———Trust upon notes for idols—Impressing of, by donor subsequent to gift—Validity—Donee's rights in case of.

The question was whether four Government notes which were given by M to the defendant were impressed with a trust for certain idols, as alleged by the plaintiffs. The time of the gift of the notes to the defendant was the years 1852 and 1853.

In support of their case the plaintiffs relied upon a document of the date of July 1854. It was not a testamentary disposition; it was not a conveyance; it was not a deed; but it appeared to be a statement of properties more in the nature of an inventory than anything else. It was headed "Statement of properties belonging to Sudhamoni Dassya" (the defendant), and it began, "Statement of lands and houses, ghats and gardens, buildings etc., and company's paper, etc., belonging to Sudhamoni." Then there was the further statement, "when Sudhamoni Dassya dies, Baboos Radharomun, Krishna Lal, and Nilini Lal Dutt will succeed to the properties detailed below." Then followed a statement that the notes in question were on account of those idols.

GOVERNMENT NOTES—GIFT OF—(Contd.)

Held that the document, which bore date in July 1854, a considerable time after the notes had been endorsed to the defendant (the notes having been all endorsed between the dates of October, 1852 and April 1853) would not of itself have the effect of controlling those endorsements or of affixing a trust upon the notes (212).

Semble, the statement in the document that the notes in question were on account of those idols may after all be nothing more than a statement of the opinion of M at the time that the proper service of the idols might be properly performed out of the proceeds of the notes (211). IMPERFECT GIFT—COMPLETED GIFT—EVIDENCE.

———Agarwalla Jains—Gift to relative on occasion of adoption and of marriage.

Plaintiff, an Agarwalla Jain, claimed in right of his mother, M, to be entitled to two sums of money alleged to have been gifted to her, in accordance with the practice in the Agarwalla Jain community of making munificent presents to relatives on the occasion of adoptions and marriages, by her (M's) grandmother on the occasions of her adoption of a boy and of the marriage of that boy. The question for decision was whether the alleged gifts were imperfect gifts or were completed gifts.

At the time of the alleged gifts M was only about 15. M's grandmother carried on, after her husband's death, his business on her own account, and maintained account books. In her account books, there was a ledger account in the name of M which began in 1896 and was continued down to M's death in 1904. In 1901 there was an entry in the day book thus: "2,00,000, credited to M's account, dated 14-1-1901, given credit to you on account of Chiranji Mahadeo Prasad" (the boy adopted by M's grandmother); and in 1903 another entry: "Rs. 31,000 credited to M's account, presented on the occasion of Mahadeo Prasad's riding on horse at the time of his marriage ceremony." Those were the two alleged gifts. The account of M was carried on from year to year. Periodically it was credited with sums received from debtors as interest; occasionally it was debited with sums for legal expenses on payments to her father-in-law as her guardian.

The books of the grandmother's firm showed her entering those sums, not in any cash book as sums received from and deposited by M or on her account, but as credits under her granddaughter's name, which afterwards were divided by the grandmother's directions among M's children long after her death. There was no evidence that M, who lived up to 19 ever knew about any of the things which were done by her grandmother. Neither she nor any one on her behalf gave any instructions or operated on the account at all, and whatever was done was done under the direction of the grandmother. There was no evidence that M ever in fact accepted the alleged gifts. Though there were loans made to debtors and credits of interest received from debtors in the accounts under M's name, she was charged no commission as apon an investment of her moneys, nor did she draw on the income. No accounts were rendered ; no correspondence passed.

Held that the Courts below correctly appreciated and applied the rules of law relating to imperfect gifts, and that their conclusion that neither of the sums in question was ever the subject of a completed gift at all must be affirmed. (Viscount Sumner.) HARIRAM v. MADAN GOPAL.

In Humphrey v. Tayleur (Amb. 138) Lord Chancellor Hardwicke said, "If an estate is limited to two jointly, the one capable of taking, the other not, he who is capable shall take the whole." This principle does not depend upon any peculiarity in English law.

Where, therefore, a Hindu widow, entitled by custom to convey absolutely her husband's share in family property only to her daughter or daughter's son, executed a deed of gift conveying the same absolutely to her daughter and to her daughter's husband, to whom she was not competent to convey, and it was contended that the gift, being invalid as regards the daughter's husband, was also invalid as regards the daughter, held that, the gift being to the two donees jointly, the above principle was applicable to the deed of gift, and the daughter took the whole (47). NATURE OF—IMMEDIATE ABSOLUTE CONVEYANCE OF PROPERTY—LIFETIME OF DONOR—GIFT TO TAKE EFFECT AFTER.

———Evidence—Donee's rights in latter case in lifetime of donor—Declaration of.

M, a Hindu widow, executed two deeds conveying to her two married daughters in equal moieties, immediately and absolutely, certain nine mouzahs, of which she had the absolute power of disposing. One of her daughters died, leaving an infant son, who survived her three days. Thereupon, the plaintiff brought the suit out of which the appeal arose for the purpose of recovering possession of his deceased wife's share of one-half of the nine mouzahs so conveyed by M.

M's main defence to the suit was that, with a view of preventing disputes in future amongst her two daughters, she executed a deed of gift in the nature of a will, with the intention, that she should remain in possession during her life, and after her death her daughters would be entitled. She adduced evidence to the effect that at the time of the execution of the deeds there was a verbal arrangement that they should operate only as a conveyance of the property after her death ; and that, during her life, her daughters were to retain her property in trust or, as it is sometimes called, benami for her.

Held, on the evidence reversing the High Court, that the defendant, M, had made out her case, that the suit, in so far as it prayed for present possession, was not maintainable, but that the plaintiff was entitled to a declaration that his wife had, and that he, as the heir of his wife through his infant son, had the right to a vested remainder upon the death of M, and that he was entitled to have his name substituted for that of his wife upon the register, (*Sir Robert P. ———Deed—Gift by.

The defendant set up a gift in her favour of the suit property by its former owner through whom the plaintiff claimed. The Courts below concurrently found in favour of the said gift. But though they were agreed as to the gift, they were at variance on the vital question whether the gift was by deed or by word of mouth. On appeal by the plaintiff seeking to overturn the concurrent judgments of the Courts below, their Lordships felt that the case was attended with so much obscurity that, if it were unattended by previous decisions, they would have great difficulty in deciding it. On the whole, however, their judgment was in favour of the gift, and they were clear that, if the evidence proved a gift, it proved a gift by deed. They, therefore, affirmed the judgment below (126-7). (Sir Arthur Hobhouse.) PRINCE MIZRA JEHAN KADR BAHADUR v. NAWAB BADSHOO BAHOO SAHIB. (1885) 12 I. A. 124 = 12 C. 1 (8) = 4 Sar. 630.

The suit was by a donor against a donee to have the deed of gift declared to be illegal and null and void, and to have a decree for possession of the property given by it. The plaint alleged that the defendant, as well as his councillors and legal advisers, taking advantage of the plaintiff's old age and of his illness and disqualifications, separated him from his son's relatives and advisers, and induced him to sign the deed and have it registered, and that he was not aware of its effects and contents.

Held, that in such a suit the Court had not to decide whether the transaction was an equitable one which the the Court should enforce (160).

Nibandhana of even date with, by which donor was to remain in possession of portion of property for her life with reverter to donee after her death—Accounts of that portion of property on foot of—Decree for—Grant in appeal of—Propriety.*

Plaintiff executed a deed of gift of her properties in favour of the defendant, who on the same day executed a Nibhandapatra in favour of the plaintiff under which a fourth share of the properties conveyed under the deed of gift were to remain with the plaintiff during her lifetime, and, on her death, the same were to revert to the defendant. Sometime after, the plaintiff sued to set aside the deed of gift on the ground that it was obtained by the defendant by fraud and misrepresentation, and also sought for confirmation of her possession in respect of the properties comprised in the said deed of gift and for an account. The trial judge and the High Court on appeal found against the plaintiff on the question of fraud and misrepresentation and held that the deed of gift was perfectly valid and operated in praesenti in favour of the defendant.

In the appeal to the High Court, it was contended for the plaintiff that the Court below should have given the plaintiff a decree at least for an account in respect of the four annas share of the properties comprised in the Nibhandapatra, which was admittedly in the possession of the defendant. The High Court, however, held that upon the plaint as it was presented. the plaintiff was not entitled to the relief claimed. On appeal, the Privy Council upheld the judgment of the High Court.

The action of the plaintiff was upon the footing that the whole of the properties comprised in the deed of gift were properties belonging to the plaintiff and that the defendant held the same as agent. It has been found that three-fourths of the said properties were not in the possession of the defendant as agent but as owner, and the only question that may possibly arise is whether in regard to the one-fourth share of the properties comprised in the deed of Nibhandapatra, the defendant did not occupy the position of an agent of the plaintiff, and as such whether he is not bound to render to the plaintiff an account. If we were to award to the plaintiff a decree calling upon the defendant to render an account in respect of the said four annas share, it would be upon a basis wholly different from that upon which the suit was founded. Further there was no specific issue directed to the said four annas share.—Per The High Court. (Lord Macnaghten.) MAHMUDA KHATUN CHOWDHURANI v. MAHOMED OLAHADAD KHAN PANI. (1912) 23 I. ———Undue influence—Execution under—Donor's suit to set aside deed on ground of—Proof necessary in case of.

The suit was by a donor against a donee to have the deed of gift declared to be illegal and null and void, and to have a decree for possession of the property given by it. The plaint alleged that the defendant, as well as his councillors and legal advisers, taking advantage of the plaintiff's old age and of his illness and disqualifications, separated him from his son's relatives and advisers, and induced him to sign the deed and have it registered, and that he was not aware of its effects and contents.

The donor was heir to a share in an ancestral estate, which was in the possession of a third party. Expecting that his right would be contested by another claimant, the donor made a gift of his right to the share to his brother's son, providing that he, the donor, should have nothing to do with the cost of getting possession. After the donee had obtained possession, the donor sued to set aside the deed. It appeared that the donor had executed the deed with full knowledge of its contents and effect, voluntarily and without any pressure. No undue influence had been exercised, nor had any unsound advice been given to him by or on behalf of the donee and no confidence had been reposed by the donor in the donee.

Held, reversing the Court below, that the deed could not be set aside on the ground that the transaction was an inequitable bargain. (Sir Richard Couch.) GANGA BAKHSH v. JAGAT BAHADUR SINGH. (1895) 22 I. A. 153 = 23 C. 15 = 5 Sar. 643.

The appeal arose out of a suit relating to the title to the estate of one K. The respondents were the heirs of R, and they alleged that K had made a gift of the estate to R. If there was no such deed of gift the title of the appellant was a good one. The Courts below and their Lordships found in favour of the gift. The appellant alleged that he had been in possession of the estate rightfully under a deed of gift from R's widow, and that he was entitled to the income during that time. The Court below adjudicated to the appellant the ownership of some villages which it appeared that during that period he purchased out of the surplus or savings from the income. But besides the land he received a certain quantity of chattels which might be called stock and plant. The appellant contended that, as the original stock and plant must have worn out, and the appellant was not under any obligation to replace it, therefore that which he had in fact brought in to replace it belonged to him and not to the estate.

Held that, so far as there was stock and plant belonging to the villages which the Court below had adjudicated to the appellant, he was entitled to take the same; but that with regard to the other property which formed part of the estate which was adjudicated to the respondents the appellant was in the position of an ordinary tenant for life who enjoyed furniture and plant which wore out from time to time, and which he replaced, and that that which was found attached to the property which the respondents received must follow the title to that property (128). ———Life-interest in property without power of alienation and authority to adopt—Deed giving.

An anumatipatra executed by a Hindu in favour of his wife ran as follows:—"You are my wife. You have no children born. I am now very ill in body. I have no hope of life. On my death there will be no one to perform the ancestral deb-kisti (worship of the gods). etc., and offer the jolpinda (funeral cake and libations of water) of my ancestors. For the observance of all these rites, and of the jolpinda to the ancestors, as well as the preservation of the Zemindarys, lakhiraj, dewutter, etc.. I, in my sound mind, give you permission on my death to keep possession of my Zemindarys, dewutter, etc., recording your own name in the Collectorate Sherishta, to remain in enjoyment of the profits, and to defray the expenses of the deb-kisti during your lifetime, and to adopt one or two sons born in the family of true Brahmans. On your death, that adopted son will succeed to all properties; and on the said adopted son attaining his majority, you will, if you should desire it, get his name recorded in the Zemindary tahoot, and surrender the entire management to him. Now I am a debtor to mahajans (creditors). Some mehals of the Zemindary are in mortgage on account of those debts. If there should be no other means of liquidating the debts, you will either sell a small portion of the Zemindary or make conditional sale of it, as appears necessary, and liquidate the debts."

Held, on the construction of the anumatipatra, that the widow took a life-interest in the properties, and that power was given to her by it to adopt a son, but that the deed gave her no authority to alienate the estate (56). ———Management of estate—Trust for—Creation of—Absolute estate to widow to be divested on minor son coming of age—Conferring of—Test.

A Hindu, who was suffering from corporeal illness, and who had a purpose of going to reside at Benares, executed in favour of his two wives a Hibbanamah, the material parts of which were as follows:—You, two individuals, being my wives; my sons born of you, both are minors; therefore, all my properties I give to you both by executing a deed of gift. They shall remain in my possession all my lifetime. After my death you, entering into possession of all the properties shall uphold the worship of my Deities, etc. You shall perform the ceremonies of shradh, etc., according to my means. According to this deed of gift, you shall enter your own names in the Collectorate, to the exclusion of my own name and enjoy possession by paying the Government revenue. But you shall have no authority to make a gift or alienate by sale. When my two sons arrive at majority you shall have their names entered in the Collectorate, and your own names expunged. God forbid that one of my two sons should die, but if one should accidentally die, then the son, who may survive you, shall have all the properties entered in his name.

Held that the deed provided only a species of trust for management, and that it did not interfere with the devolution of the estate according to the ordinary law of succession under the Hindu Law. Their Lordships overruled the contention that the deed gave to the widows an absolute interest, subject to be divested in the event of their sons or either of their sons coming of age.

The learned Counsel have laid some stress upon the direction, "you shall perform the ceremonies of shradh, etc., according to my means," and have contended that that implies a charge to the person to perform the funeral ceremonies of the donor, and, therefore, must be taken to imply a change in the course of succession to his estate. Their Lordships, however, are of opinion, that the words "Shradh, etc." are somewhat wide and ambiguous, and that if the Hibbanamah be taken, as they think it ought to be taken, to be an arrangement providing for the management of everything from the date of it, during the life of the donor himself, it may be taken to refer to, certainly to include, those family religious ceremonies which the donor himself would, from time to time, if he remained in his home, and in possession of his strength and faculties, be bound to perform. They, therefore, cannot give to those words the force which, it has been contended, ought to be given to them (222-3). In a case in which, under a deed of gift executed by a Hindu in favour of his wife, the latter takes the estate only of a Hindu widow, one consequence, no doubt, would be that she would be unable to alienate the profits, or that at all events, whatever she purchased out of them, would be an increment to her husband's estate, and her husband's heirs would be entitled to recover possession of all such property, real and personal. But, on the other hand, she would have certain rights as a Hindu widow; for example, she would have the right under certain circumstances, if the estate were insufficient to defray the funeral expenses or her maintenance, to alienate it altogether. She certainly would have the power of selling her own estate; and it would further follow that the person who, under the deed, was to be entitled to the estate after her death, would not be possessed in any sense of a vested remainder, but merely of a contingent one. It would also follow that she would completely represent the estate, and under certain circumstances the Statute of Limitations might run against the heirs to the estate, whoever they might be (260-1). A Hindu died leaving him surviving a widow, a daughter and an adopted son. On the same day a document of a very similar character and very similar in terms was also executed by G, the adopted son.

Held, that the clause set out above could not be characterised as a preamble in the deed, that the actual gift to the donee of the malik was in truth in that disposition, which was the substantive disposition, that, in construing the deed, it must be looked at as a whole, that the words in the clause set out above—"and all rights appertaining thereto with the following conditions" fundamentally affected the construction of the deed as a whole, and that, so construed, the deed as a whole, left no room for doubt that it did not confer the maliki rights without conditions, nor did it confer on the donee those rights of property and alienation which a bare disposition in favour of a person denominated as malik would have involved. ———Estate conveyed—Property given to woman by her husband—Estate which under Hindu Law woman has in—Absolute estate to wife and her successors subject only to defeasance in certain event—Test—Deed—Construction.

On 4th September, 1875, Raja J, a Hindu governed by the Mitakshara school, executed a deed of gift of his self-acquired property, the material terms of which are set out in the judgment of their Lordships. At the date of the deed, the Raja had a son by his senior wife, Balwant Singh, aged 34, who was then in prison undergoing a sentence of imprisonment for culpable homicide, and a daughter, M, aged 7, by his junior wife, Rani Kishori. It appeared clearly from the recitals in the deed that the Raja's intention was to disinherit his unworthy son, Balwant Singh, as regards his self-acquired property. It appeared equally clear from the body of the deed that his intention was that, if Balwant Singh had a son, that son on attaining majority should have the estate. The plaintiff was the son of Balwant Singh, but the provisions of the deed in his favour could not take effect by reason of the rule of law that a gift in favour of an unborn person is void and inoperative. The plaintiff had, therefore, to show that, on the true construction of the deed, there was an intestacy when he attained majority by reason of the failure of the gift over in his favour and that he became entitled to come in as heir of the settlor.

After reciting that the settlor had been compelled to exclude Balwant Singh from the right of representing him and from inheritance, and that for the purpose of maintaining the name and protecting the property, it was necessary that there should be some representative (literally some one to stand in his place), and that there was none but Rani Kishori, the deed went on, "I have therefore made a gift in favour of Rani Kishori of all my movable and immovable properties . . . and appoint her my successor and representative subject to the following conditions." Under Condition 1 the villages were to be " owned by the Rani Sahib just as I owned," and complete possession was to be given her. Similarly as to the 10 per cent. on the revenue of seven villages, Condition 2 provided that, after the settlor's death, " the Rani Saheb would be entitled to get it and none would be able to offer obstruction."

Condition 6 provided that if a son was born to Balwant within the next 16 years—in other words, before he attained the age of 50—such son was to take the property on his attaining majority, and the Rani was bound to retain "the proprietary possession" until he did attain majority. If, however, no son was born to Balwant before he attained the age of 50, she was not to be bound to retain the proprietary possession herself, but was expressly empowered to give or bequeath it to her daughter or her daughter's son, " to appoint owner and representative and heir " her daughter, or her daughter's son if she had one, and failing them to make an adoption, and in regard to all these cases she was empowered " to impose any condition or conditions which she thinks necessary in regard to manner of succession and possession of property."

Condition 7 then dealt with the birth of a son to Balwant after he had attained the age of 50, when the widow might have transferred the estate to her daughter and her daughter's son or to an adopted son under Condition 6, and provided that she or her transferee should retain the property until Balwant's son attained his majority and hand it over then. Further, it provided that, on succeeding to the property, Balwant's son should be bound to pay Rs. 100 a month to the person from whom he obtained it.

Condition 8 provided for what was to happen in case of the Rani dying before Balwant attained the age of 50 in case a son had been born to him but had not attained majority, or in case no son had been born to him. In either event the Rani's power of disposition under Condition 6 would not have come into operation, and, accordingly, the settlor himself provided that in those events the property was to " devolve on M or son if alive " who should remain in possession until a son was born to Balwant and attain majority, in which case he would take, and the person on whom the property had devolved would be entitled to receive Rs. 100 a month.

Condition 9, whilst making some provision for Balwant, recited that he personally had been excluded from the succession and had no power or authority to interfere with the property, possession and future powers of the Rani.

Held, that the provisions of the deed clearly showed that the settlor's intention was that the property should pass to the Rani and her successors under the deed to the exclusion of the settlor's heirs, unless a son was born to Balwant and attained majority, and that in that event Balwant's son was to come in and take the estate under the deed, and not as the settlor's heir on the suggested intestacy arising from the failure of the gift over to him, following the determination of the estate limited to the Rani and her successors until Balwant's son should attain majority.

Two intentions appear clearly in the deed, one to exclude Balwant altogether from inheritance, the other to bring in his son on his attaining majority. Both intentions are effectuated under the deed by holding that the Rani and her successors took an estate subject to defeasance on the happening of a certain event, the attainment of majority by a son of Balwant. On the other hand, the construction contended for on behalf of the plaintiff would defeat the settlor's intention by letting in Balwant as the settlor's heir if he was alive, as he very well might have been, when the plaintiff attained majority. For these reasons their Lordships are of opinion that the provisions in the unborn son's favour amount to a condition subsequent, and that the failure thereof does not affect the prior disposition.

Their Lordships are therefore unable to agree with the learned Judges of the High Court " that the Rani was left as a custodian of the property until its final devolution to a full owner. " The Rani and her successors were put in, not merely as custodians until the attainment of majority of Balwant's son, an event which might never happen, but also to effect the disherison of Balwant himself by leaving the property away from the settlor's natural heirs. The terms of the deed clearly show that they were given an estate which was not limited but absolute, in point of duration, and subject only to defeasance in case of Balwant having a son who attained majority or the Rani dying before the settlor. Under the Mithila Law a simple and pure gift by the husband to the wife does not convey to her absolute ownership. She takes it only for her life without any right of alienation unless power of alienation is expressly conferred on her. The limitation imposed by the Mithila Law, which declares that gifts by husbands will only convey a life-interest to the wife, applies exclusively to pure and simple gifts, and not to a gift for consideration. A gift deed executed by a Hindu subject to the Mithila law in favour of his wife began with describing the husband as the absolute proprietor of seven annas eight gundas of the property. It then recited that there was a decree against the husband for Rs. 41,000 odd, that it was under execution, and that the husband was unable to procure money for the payment of the decretal amount. The document then proceeded as follows :—

" As a sale (of the property) will entail loss of the said two milkiat properties on sale, belonging to me, the executant, I, of my own free will and accord, have out of the said two mouzahs on sale made a gift for consideration (hiba-bil-ewaz) of 7 annas $8\frac{3}{4}$ gundas share, etc., together with fruit-bearing and non-fruit-bearing trees, ahars, pokhars, reservoirs, tanks, tenants, all Zamindari rights, which I have in my possession up to this time, without participation of any one, to my wife Mussumat Aruragin Bahuasin on receiving from her Rs. 41,532-6-8 K, 16 m 16 in cash and having paid therewith the decretal amount due to the said decree-holder got the properties released from sale and put the said Mussumat in possession of the gift properties. The said Mussumat should have and hold possession of the gift properties and enjoy the produce thereof generation after generation, and I, the executant and my heirs and representatives neither have nor shall have any demand or dispute with respect to the gift properties or the consideration thereof, as against the said Mussumat, her heirs and representatives. Should I, the executant, my heirs and representatives make any claim or put forward any demand in respect of the gift properties or the consideration thereof the same shall be deemed null and void. "

Held, affirming the courts below, that the transfer was not a gift pure and simple but was a gift for consideration, and that the wife took the property in full right of ownership. The distinction between what is description only and what is the reason or motive of a gift or bequest may often be very fine, but it is a distinction which must be drawn from a consideration of the language and the surrounding circumstances. If a man makes a bequest to his "wife A.B.," believing the person named to be his lawful wife, and he has not been imposed upon by her, and falsely led to believe that he could lawfully marry her, and it afterwards appears that the marriage was not lawful, it may be that the legality of the marriage is not essential to the validity of the gift. Whether the marriage was lawful or not may be considered to make no difference in the intention of the testator (89). (Sir Richard Couch.) FANINDRA DEB RAIKAT v. RAJESWAR DASS. (1885) 12 I. The question was whether a gift of villages made by an Uriya zemindar to his wife by way of maintenance was absolute or for her life only. The power of the zemindar to make a complete alienation was not questioned. The terms of the grant, if any, were unknown.

The District Judge held that the presumption in cases where an Uriya zemindar gave a village to his wife was that it was a life-interest only that was given, and that that presumption had not been rebutted. On appeal, the High Court remitted an issue "whether there is a local custom for zemindars to give villages to their wives for life only, and if such custom is valid."

A grant of villages by a Hindu to his sister for her support provided: "Being in possession of the lands and paying rent according to the takut jumma, do you and the generations (Santan Sreni) born of your womb successively (Krame) enjoy the same. No other heir of yours shall have right or interest."

Held, on a construction of the grant, that the sister took an absolute estate defeasible in the event of a failure of issue living at the time of her death, in which event the estate was to revert to the donor and his heirs, and that she had, therefore, an estate which she could dispose of by will (148).

The words of the grant with the exception of the last line "No other heir of yours shall have right or interest" appear to import an absolute estate, such as would have been given had the words been "your children and grandchildren." And no inference so far arises that the donor had an English estate tail in contemplation. The only difficulty is caused by the words which follow, "No other heir of yours shall have right or interest." These negative words may be read as referring to the time of the death of the sister, and their effect is to make the absolute estate before given defeasible in the event of failure of issue living at the time of her death, in which event the estate was to revert to the donor and his heirs (147-8). In a case in which it was found that a Hindu, when about to marry a second wife, stated to his first wife that he would appropriate that part of the property which he had purchased in his own name as a present to her in consideration of his being about to marry the second wife and nearly 15 years afterwards caused the property to be changed from his own name into that of his first wife, their Lordships affirmed the finding of the trial Court that mutation of names was not for the purpose of putting the property into the name of the first wife benami for the husband, but for her own benefit, and that it was therefore her stridhan (35).

The husband, when he made the transfer into the name of his first wife, did not appear to have had any creditors or any particular reason for putting the property into her name instead of allowing it to remain in his own name, unless it was for the purpose of giving her a benefit (35). Further the circumstance, appearing in the evidence, that the object of the husband in putting the property into the name of the first wife was that the issue of the second wife should have no share in it, is inconsistent with the view that the transfer was merely benami (35). ———Maintenance—Arrears of—Claim against husband for—Right to—Residence apart for long time without justification—Effect.

Suit by Hindu wife against her husband to recover twelve years' arrears of maintenance. Admittedly, the plaintiff had left her husband's house 23 years before suit and had not lived with her husband or in his house as his wife for 23 years before his death. The main question in the case was whether she was justified in so leaving her husband's house, and in continuing to remain away for all the intervening years that had elapsed prior to suit.

Held, on the evidence reversing the High Court and restoring the Sub-Judge, that the plaintiff had voluntarily lived away from her husband without justification, and that there having been no real attempt on her part to enforce a claim for maintenance or to procure a return to her husband's house during the long series of years which had elapsed prior to suit, she was not entitled to the arrears claimed. ———Purchase in name of—Benami for husband or not—Presumption—Onus of proof—Evidence.

There can be no doubt now that a purchase in India by a native of India of property in India in the name of his wife unexplained by other proved or admitted facts is to be regarded as a benami transaction, by which the beneficial interest in the property is in the husband, although the ostensible title is in his wife. The rule of the law of England that such a purchase by a husband in England is to be assumed to be a purchase for the advancement of the wife does not apply in India.

Where, therefore, a Hindu son brought a suit for the recovery, as against his father's creditors, of a house purchased by his father in the name of his wife (plaintiff's mother) alleging that the purchase was made by the father in performance of an ante-nuptial agreement made by him to settle a house upon her, that the suit house really belonged to her, and that she was not a mere benamidar for her husband.

Held, that, if the plaintiff failed to prove the ante-nuptial agreement alleged by him, and that it was in performance of that agreement that the suit property was purchased by his father in his mother's name, the plaintiff's suit must fail.

Held further, that the plaintiff had failed to prove the ante-nuptial agreement set up by him, and that his mother had no beneficial interest in the suit property and was a mere benamidar for her husband. (Sir John Edge.) SURA LAKSHMIAH CHETTY v. KOTHANDARAMA PILLAI.

FATHER'S ESTATE — SHARE IN, AS AGAINST HIS WIDOW.

——Computation of—True method of.

The question was whether under the Mithakshara law the sole illegitimate son of a zemindar was entitled as against the zemindar's lawfully-married widow, to a one-third or one-half share in the personal or self-acquired properties of the zemindar.

Held, affirming the High Court, that the plaintiff was entitled to share equally with the widow.

The text and the commentary speak of the illegitimate son being made partaker of a moiety of a share or participating for half of a share, but there is no explicit statement as to the unit in which he is to take his half share. There are two possible views—either that he is to take one-half of the other participant's share, or one-half of what the illegitimate son would have taken had he been legitimate. The true method of computation is to allot to the illegitimate son one-half of what he would have taken had he been legitimate. Where, therefore, the competition is between the illegitimate son and the widow the former, if born of a lawfully-wedded wife, would have taken the whole, by reason of his illegitimacy this would be reduced to one half; and so he and the lawfully-married widow would take in equal shares. ———Right of—Deed taking away—What amounts to.

In a suit for partition brought by one of the illegitimate sons of an Englishman by two native women against his brothers, a razeenamah was entered into, which provided that there should be no sale, mortgage, lease, or security of any separate share of the property left to the five sons by their father; that, during the lifetime of T, one of the defendants, he should have the management of the whole estate, the plaintiff receiving a fixed income; and that after T's death, the plaintiff should have the management of his fifth, and the management of the other four-fifths should be entrusted to M or C, also defendants.

Held that, on the right construction of the Razeenamah, the right of inheritance which the plaintiff in the suit in which the razeenamah was entered into might have to T was not intended to be taken away by the razeenamah (419-20).

The provisions of the razeenamah point to management, and to management only. They affect the mode of enjoyment, not the right of property. That right does not appear to be affected by the deed otherwise than by the particular provisions against alienation—provisions which, it is to be observed, are carefully limited by the deed, and do not extend to prevent alienation by devise, for it is plain that the deed contemplates that each co-sharer might devise. It is scarcely possible to suppose that it could be intended that the right to devise should be preserved, but that the right of inheritance should be taken away (419-20). JOINT FAMILY BETWEEN AN, AND ANOTHER ILLEGITIMATE SON OF SAME FATHER BY DIFFERENT MOTHER—(Contd.)

Illegitimate sons of a Christian father by different Hindu mothers, constituting themselves parceners in the enjoyment of their property after the manner of a Hindu joint family, are not an united family in the ordinary sense in which that term is used in the text-writers on the Hindu law. On the death of each, his lineal heirs, representing their parent, would, by the effect of the agreement, enter into that partnership; collaterals, however, could not so enter by succession, unless the Hindu law gave, in the case under consideration, a right of inheritance also to collaterals. The parties could not by their agreement give new rights of succession to themselves or their heirs unknown to the law. The law of survivorship, which is the consequence of such a partnership amongst Hindus, would come in only on failure of the heirs (420). (Lord Kingsdown.) MYNA BOYEE v. OOTARAM. (1861) 8 M. I. The plaintiff was an illegitimate son of a deceased holder of an Oudh talook, and the defendant, its holder before and at the time of the suit, was the legitimate son of the deceased holder. It was found that there was a binding family arrangement between the parties by which the plaintiff was entitled to hold an estate appertaining to the talook for his maintenance on payment to the defendant of, at most, a rent of Rs. 2 001. In proceedings for the Settlement of the talook, the plaintiff was recorded as an under-proprietor of the estate held by him. The order of the Settlement Officer, however, contained a note to the following effect:—"As B" (plaintiff) "is to be recorded as under-proprietor of the Sawansa estate without condition, it is desirable, for the security of the talooka, that his liability to pay the talookdary allowance at the rate of 5 per cent. besides the jumma, which may be fixed, should be noted; and as the Rajah" (defendant) "and B assent to this: Ordered, that the name of B be entered as under-proprietor of all the villages in talooka Sawansa." There was, however, no evidence that the defendant insisted upon a change of the terms on which the estate was to be held by the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff assented to it. There was also no evidence that after the order of the Settlement Officer the plaintiff made the enhanced payment of Rs. 3,650 noted in it.

The plaintiff sued to establish his title to an impartible raj. The plaintiff was the illegitimate son of one U. On the death of U, he was succeeded in the raj by N, his legitimate son. N died leaving no son, but leaving three widows—Ranis—and a daughter by one of them. On the death of N, the plaintiff claimed to be entitled by right of survivorship to succeed to the Raj. U and his family were Sudras; the law governing the family was the Mitakshara law; and the suit raj was the joint impartible estate of N and the plaintiff.

Held, affirming the High Court, that the plaintiff was entitled to succeed to the Raj by virtue of survivorship. (Sir Richard Couch.) RAJA JOGENDRA BHUPATI HURRI CHUNDUN MAHAPATRA v. NITYANUND MANSINGH. (1890) 17 I. A. 128 = 18 C. 151 = 5 Sar. 596.

That is the result of the decisions of the Board in cases of impartible estates in India which descend according to a custom of primogeniture. Until the law on this subject was placed by decisions of the Board beyond a doubt, there was a current of judicial decisions in the Presidency of Madras to the effect that a holder of an impartible estate which descended by a rule of primogeniture could not transfer except for his own lifetime any part of the estate unless possibly for necessity. Prior to 1889, there had been a series of decisions to this effect in the Madras Courts, but in that year, following the decision of this Committee in 10 A. 272 (Sartaj Kuari's case), the High Court of Madras over-ruled those decisions (13 M. 197); and it has recently been held by this Committee in the Pittapur case (22 M. 383) that impartible Zemindaries in the Presidency of Madras are not inalienable in the absence of proof of some special family custom or tenure attaching to the Zemindari, and having that effect. Impartible Estate—Compromise regarding—Impartibility of estate if altered by—(Contd.)

After the death of the last holder of an impartible estate descendible according to the rule of primogeniture a will was set up by his widow and a suit was instituted by the reversioner contesting the genuineness of the will and an agreement was entered into by the parties which provided, inter alia, that the widow was to have a life-interest for her life in the estate subject to certain conditions and that the reversioner or his successor should be the absolute owner of the estate and should occupy the gaddi, and the will was subsequently admitted to probate, held, in a suit by the reversioner's widow claiming proprietary possession of the estate as against her husband's distant cousin in the male line and certain other members of his family, that the rights of the parties to the suit depended upon the construction of the compromise and not upon the will, and that the impartible character of the estate was not changed by the terms of the compromise.

Upon the language of the compromise it is not possible to hold that the character of the estate, as it had been handed down from father to son for generations, was changed. As an impartible estate the reversioner laid claim to it, and the compromise provided that as an impartible estate it should devolve upon him. The reversioner never admitted the validity of the will as against him, and never admitted that the widow obtained any title under the will (17-8). The younger sons of a Maharaj of Darbhanga are styled Babus, and by the kulachar each younger son is entitled, by way of a Babuana grant, to a portion of the raj reasat for the maintenance of himself and his male descendants in the male line, and the wife of a younger son of a Maharaja of Darbhanga gets, by way of a Sohag grant, the usufruct of a portion of the raj reasat for the maintenance of herself and her male descendants in the male line. In each case the property, village or villages, granted continues to form part of the raj reasat, from which it is never separated; it is entered in the Government revenue registers under the name of the Maharaja for the time being of Darbhanga as the proprietor, and the property so granted reverts to the Maharaja for the time being of Darbhanga on the failure of male descendants in the male line of the grantee. Babuana grants and Sohag grants differ essentially in their nature from absolute grants, and are subject to the kulachar under which they are authorised and in accordance with which they are made (279). Impartible Estate—Devarakotta Estate.

Held, on the evidence reversing the High Court and restoring the District Judge, that the Devarakotta estate was impartible and descended to the eldest son of the last owner.

The result of the evidence is that at this time (1801) Ankanna was in possession of the estate by right of primogeniture as an impartible estate, and was so regarded by the Government. On 8th December, 1802, an istimrar sanad was granted under Regulation XXV of 1802 by the then Governor of Madras to Ankanna fixing the assessment of the Zemindari, and declaring it to be permanent. Ankanna thus acquired a permanent property in the land at a fixed assessment, but there was no grant of the land, and the rule of succession to it was not altered. The estate remained entire, and there is no evidence of any intention of the Government to alter the nature of the tenure. What is said by this Board in the judgment in the Hunsapore case is applicable to the present case. The estate continued to be impartible, and the rule of succession to it was not altered. Impartible Estate—Dhalboom Estate.

———Dhalboom family—Origin—Law governing—Titles of honour denoting precedence in family.

The Dhalboom family is one of a group of families whose ancestors originally came from the north-west part of India and established themselves by conquest in that part of Bengal which is known as the Jungle Mehals. Some of these families, like the Dhalboom family, are now governed by the Mithakshara law, and others by the Dayabhaga. But there are intermarriages between them. In all the Raj descends on a single heir. These families, or, at any rate, the more important of them, keep up a sort of semi-royal state, and dignify the heir-apparent and those in immediate succession with titles of honour which denote precedence. Thus in the Dhalboom family the eldest son of the ruling Raja takes the title of Jubraj, the second that of Hikim, the third that of Bara Thakoor, the fourth that of Koer, the fifth that of Musib, and the remaining sons that of Babu. ———Eldest son of last—Legitimacy of—Decision as to, in suit by one of younger sons to recover estate from him—Effect of, on another younger son by different wife of last holder.

The last male holder of an impartible estate died leaving several wives and several sons. On his death a contest arose among his sons as to who should succeed to the Raj, and, with the Raj, to the possession of the property. M, the father of the appellant and the eldest son of the deceased, was put into possession. Thereupon a suit was instituted on behalf of R, an infant son of the deceased, to recover from M the possession of the Raj and the possession of the property that went with the Raj. R alleged that M was illegitimate. It was found in that suit that R was the legitimate son of the deceased, but it was also found that M was also a legitimate son, and it was held that, being at least in equal rank with R, and being the elder, M was entitled to succeed to the Raj in preference to R.

The respondent before their Lordships was a posthumous son of the deceased Raja by a different wife, and he instituted the suit out of which the appeal arose raising the question of the illegitimacy of M and also the question of a priority of right by reason of the superior nature of the marriage between the last holder and his mother.

Held, affirming the High Court, that the respondent's suit was not barred by res judicata by reason of the decision in R's suit (375-6).

The issues in the two suits are not precisely the same. But even if they had been precisely the same their Lordships would still have been of opinion, that the decree in the former suit is not a bar to the further prosecution of this suit. In this case all the members of the family had conflicting interests. R's suit was a mere suit for possession by a party claiming to have a preferable right to the party in possession, and having failed to establish that case by proving the ille-upon its merits, it is impossible to disregard what has passed, whether in this suit or in others. For half a century this Zemindary has been under the harrow of litigation ; for many years between the elder and younger branch of the Padamattur Tevar family, and again for many years between separate scions of the younger branch. During this long period of discussion and examination, up to the settlement of issues in this suit, every body has concurred, whether by statement, admission, or assumption, in ascribing to the Zemindary an impartible character (110). (Sir Arthur Hobhouse.) MUTHU VADUGANADHA TEVAR v. DORASINGA TEVAR. (1881) 8 I. A. 99 = 3 M. 290 (303) = 4 Sar. 239.

———Family tradition—Non-division of estate in spite of occasions for division—Estate in possession of family of trespassers during period.

The question was whether the Shivagunga Zemindary was a partible or an impartible estate.

The estate was in the possession of the elder branch of the family for thirty years, and during that time three descents had occured. There were co-parceners in that branch who would have taken shares if the Zemindary had been considered as partible ; but in fact it was always taken entire by the eldest male representative. The elder branch were, however, ultimately held to be in wrongful possession, and were therefore usurpers.

Held that, all the same, their dealing with the estate while they had it was evidence of the family traditions and of their practical operation (111). (Sir Arthur Hobhouse.) MUTHU VADUGANADHA TEVAR v. DORASINGA TEVAR. (1881) 8 I. A. 99 = 3 M. 290 (303-4) = 4 Sar. 239.

———Non-division for a long time.

The circumstance that a Zemindary had been held entire for a very long period would seem to indicate that the ordinary rules of succession had not been applied to it, and gives great countenance to the supposition that a custom of indivisibility existed (475). (Mr. Baron Parke.) RAJAH DEEDAR HOSSEIN v. RANEE ZUHOOR-OON-NISSA. (1841) 2 M.I.A. 441 = 2 Suth. 993 = 1 Sar. 217.

———The fact that an estate had never been divided during 6 or 7 generations alone cannot control the operation of the ordinary rule of Hindu Law, or deprive the parties, if members of a joint and undivided family, of the right to demand a partition when they are so minded. (Sir James W. Colvile.) THAKUR DURRIAO SINGH v. THAKUR DARI SINGH. (1873) 1 I. A. 1 (8) = 13 B. L. R. 165 = 3 Sar. 301 = F. & J's. No. 25 (Oudh).

———The High Court think that the absence of partition for many generations is as consistent with partibility as with primogeniture, unless it is shown that partition was claimed and refused. Of course if that was shown it would be very cogent evidence in favour of primogeniture. And it is possible that a divisible estate may remain undivided for a long time. But their Lordships do not think it probable that any great number of generations would pass without persons entitled to insist upon a partition taking steps to enforce it. And the fact that though, during those generations, there were occasions for a partition, yet no partition took place in fact, to put it at the lowest, lays a

PRESUMPTION—ONUS OF PROOF.

———The proof lies upon the party seeking to except any property from that principle of partition known to the Hindu Law.

Held that the appellant not having brought forward proof that the suit property was within those exceptions, the general rule of partition must prevail. ———It has been contended that the suit raj is an indivisible raj, and that the appellant is, as heir, entitled to succeed to the whole. Now both the Courts below were of opinion that the evidence produced wholly failed to establish the position that this raj was indivisible, the onus of proof under the circumstances clearly lying upon the appellant. The course of possession and enjoyment is most distinctly opposed to such a claim. The property had been held jointly, or in co-parcenary, and the person through whom the appellant makes his claim had himself, upon a former occasion, set up a title to the property, entirely inconsistent with the judgment of the Court. Nay, even the appellant himself, at the commencement of these proceedings, filed a document, in conjunction with the respondent, setting forth a joint claim (351). ———Acquisitions with—Incorporation with estate of—Intention as to—Evidence.

All the estate possessed by the last male holder of an impartible estate other than the impartible raj was derived from the income of the raj itself which income in the end produced very considerable property. There were certain villages, mortgages, usufructuary and otherwise, sums due on bonds and decrees, Government promissory notes to the extent of two lakhs, and other moveable and immoveable properties. The whole of the evidence on the question whether they were intended to be treated as accretions or not was as follows :—

" Some new properties were acquired out of the savings of Serampur gadi. When there were savings in my hand I " (the manager of the estate) "used to send the money to the raja and take receipts from him. The money was utilised by the raja by giving loans and purchasing other properties. On some occasions the raja used to lend the money himself and these sums are not entered in our books. When the loan was given through us, then we used to keep accounts of such money. I can't give the sums that passed through our hands or their probable amount. The moneys that passed through our hands were invested in loan and also in purchasing Zamindaries. The incomes of Zamindaries purchased were also entered in our books. It was treated as part of the income of the estate. Loans with interest repaid were also entered in our books, That money was also treated as part of the estate. All this was done at the instance of the raja. Loans advanced by the raja personally and not through our hands, and those that were not entered in the estate account at the time of the advance, the money when repaid used sometimes to come to our hands and sometimes paid to the raja direct. Those that came to our hands were entered in our book. What was so entered into the estate account was considered as estate money with the raja's consent. I can't say if the raja ———Nature of, in holder's hands — Joint family property—Income from ordinary—Nature of— Distinction.

The income of an impartible estate when received is the absolute property of the owner of the estate. It differs in no way from property that he might have gained by his own effort, or that had come to him in circumstances entirely dissociated from the ownership of the raj. It is a strong assumption to make that the income of the property of this nature is so affected by the source from which it came that it still retains its original character.

It is possible that the confusion that the produce of the impartible estate naturally belongs to and forms an accretion to the original property is due to the consideration of the position with regard to an ordinary joint family estate. In such a case the income, equally with the corpus, forms part of the family property, and if the owner mixes his own moneys with the moneys of the family—as, for example, by putting the whole into one account at the bank, or by treating them in his accounts as indistinguishable—his own earnings share with the property with which they are mingled the character of joint family property ; but no such considerations necessarily apply to the income from impartible property. The holder of an impartible estate, the succession to which was governed by the rule of primogeniture, made a gift of a number of villages, forming part of the estate, to his junior wife. The family was governed by the law of the Mithakshara. His son sued to set aside the gift on the ground that it had not been made for necessary purposes.

The courts below held that the plaintiff and his father, the defendant, being members of a joint Hindu family, and the suit estate being joint ancestral property, and the law of the Mithakshara being applicable, the holder of the estate could not make a gift of property appertaining to the estate except for necessary purposes, and that the gift in question not having been made for such purposes was void and must be set aside. The Courts below thought that the onus was upon the defendant to prove that by custom the estate was alienable, and held that the custom had not been proved.

———Restraint upon—Mithakshara law rule as to—Applicability of.

The reason for the restraint upon alienation under the law of the Mithakshara is inconsistent with the custom of impartibility and succession according to primogeniture. The inability of the father to make an alienation arises from the proprietary right of the sons (63). The property in the paternal or ancestral estate acquired by birth under the Mithakshara law is so connected with the right to a partition, that it does not exist where there is no right to it. By the custom or usage the eldest son succeeds to the whole estate on the death of the father, as he would if the property were held in severalty. It is difficult to reconcile this mode of succession with the rights of a joint family, and to hold that there is a joint ownership, which is a restraint upon alienation (64). If, as their Lordships are of opinion, the eldest son, where the Mithakshara law prevails and there is the custom of primogeniture, does not become a co-sharer with his father in the estate, the inalienability of the estate depends upon custom, which must be proved, or, it may be in some cases, upon the nature of the tenure (65). The last holder of the Dhalbhum Raj made a will, whereby he appointed the respondent executor, and bequeathed the estate to him and declared him to be the next Raja. The family was a joint and undivided one, governed by the Mithakshara School of Hindu law. The estate was ancestral, and succession to it was governed by a family custom according to the rule of lineal primogeniture. The Raj was impartible. Admittedly, if the will of the last holder was inoperative, the appellant, according to the rule of lineal primogeniture, would be the next heir, and would as such be entitled to succeed to the estate.

Held, following the decisions of the Board in the Sartaj Kuari and the first Pittapur cases, that the will was valid, and conferred a valid title to the estate on the respondent (297).

SEPARATION AS REGARDS.

———Agreement effecting—Agreement by holder renouncing on behalf of himself and his descendants all interest in the estate in favour of junior member if an — Effect of, on future rights of succession on foot of estate being separate property.

Muthu Vaduga was the Zemindar of Padamattur in 1829. He was joint in estate with his younger brothers, Muttuswami and Chinnasami. In 1829 the uncle of the three brothers was the Zemindar of the impartible Zemindary of Shivaganga, of which Padamattur was a Sub-tenure and he died leaving no male issue, but a wife, Parvata, then pregnant. On the death of the uncle, the Shivaganga Zemindary was claimed by Muttu Vaduga, and was given over to him by Government when Parvata was delivered of a daughter. In anticipation of that event a family arrangement took place which was embodied in an agreement of 1829 passed by Muthu Vaduga to his second brother Muthusami.

The agreement provided that, in the event of Parvata being delivered of a daughter, Muthu Vaduga and his off spring should have no interest in the palayappat of Padamattur, but that Muthuswami alone should be the Zemindar and rule and enjoy the same, allowing at the same time, as per former arrangement, to the youngest brother Chinnasami the village that had been assigned to him before. The agreement also provided that Muthuswami should have no concern with any debt contracted by Muthu Vaduga during the time he was Zemindar of Padamattur, and that the latter should himself be responsible for the same.

Padamattur was, in pursuance of that agreement, enjoyed by Muthuswami during his lifetime, and by his only son Dorai Pandian, after his death. Shivaganga was similarly enjoyed by Muthu Vaduga, and his son and grandson. As a result of a litigation commenced by Parvata and her daughter, Shivaganga, however, passed from the line of Muthu Vaduga.

Dorai Pandian died leaving a widow, but no issue. Thereupon the last son of Muthu Vaduga sued for the recovery of the Zemindary of Padamattur, on the ground that it was joint family property of the deceased and of the desendants of Muthu Vaduga, and that he (plaintiff) was therefore entitled to succeed to that estate in preference to the widow of Dorai Pandian. The question for decision was whether, by reason of the transaction in 1829, the particular property of Padamattur ceased to be the joint property of the three brothers, and so upon the death of Dorai Pandian became subject to the rule of succession affirmed in the Shivaganga Case.

Held, that the effect of the agreement of 1829 was to make Padamattur the property of the two instead of the three brothers, with, of course, all its incidents of impartibility and peculiar course of descent, and to do so as effectually as if in the course of an ordinary partition between Muthu Vaduga, on the one hand, and the two younger brothers, on the other, a particular property had fallen to the lot of the two (75), and that, consequently, as between the descendants of Muthu Vaduga and Dorai Pandian, Padamattur was the separate property of the latter, and devolved, on his death without issue, to his widow, notwithstanding the undivided status of the family, under the rule of succession affirmed in the Shivaganga Case (77).

Of course, the renunciation by Muthu Vaduga would not deprive his descendants of such future rights of succession as they might afterwards have in that property (Padamattur), treating it as separate property quoad them,—such a right of succession, for instance, as might accrue to them in the present case on the death of the widow of Dorai Pandian (74). ———Agreement effecting—What amounts to.

The question for decision in the suit was whether the suit Zemindary was separate property in the hands of its holder at the time of his death and devolved thereafter upon his widow, the defendant in the suit, or whether it was joint family property and plaintiff was entitled to the same to the exclusion of the widow. The decision depended upon the construction of a Sunnud or Samakhia entered into in 1809 between the paternal uncles of A, the father of the last holder of the estate, and a minor at the time. The arrangement was not one which was then for the first time come to, but one which had been come to by the uncles in conjunction with their father, who at that time constituted the head of the family.

Held, in view of the terms of the Sunnud and of the subsequent conduct and acts of the parties, that the Subordinate Judge was right in his construction of it, and that the document amounted to an agreement by which the joint family estate was divided among the several members of the joint family, and that the Zemindary in dispute fell to the lot of A, as his separate property. Held, accordingly that the defendant was entitled to the Zemindary. the rule of primogeniture. On the death of their father, P, the elder son, succeeded to the estate, and plaintiff, as a younger brother, became entitled, according to the usage of the family, to maintenance. For sometime after the death of his father the plaintiff received an annuity of Rs. 1,000 out of the estate of the Raj. The family was joint and undivided down to the time of the Indian Mutiny; but, in consequence of the plaintiff's misconduct during the disturbances, the payment of his annuity was withheld with the sanction and under the direction of Government. Further, in a suit brought, after P's, death, against the manager of the Court of Wards to enforce payment of the annuity during the minority of P's son the last male holder of the estate, it was held that there had been that which, adverting to the nature of the property, was equivalent to an attachment thereof, and the suit was dismissed. There was not, however, any adjudication of forfeiture under Act XXV of 1857, nor was any proceeding ever taken under that Act with reference to the estate itself.

Held, that the stoppage of the annuity, and the proceedings in respect thereof, did not amount to a confiscation of the estate, and did not in any manner alter the status of the plaintiff as a member of the joint family (153-4). Where one of two brothers, who had jointly inherited a Zemindari, allowed the other to succeed to the Estate and become Zemindar and executed in his favour two documents called "Pharikat Sunnuds" which ran as follows:—

"As we have both equally divided and taken all the cash, etc., to which both of us are entitled, I bind myself not to claim anything from you at any time, I shall reside in the village which you were pleased to give me for my maintenance, and act according to your wishes."

"I or my heirs shall not at any time make any claims against you or your heirs in respect of property, moveable or immoveable, or in respect of any transaction. As our father put you in possession of the Zemindari, I or my heirs shall not make any claim against you or your heirs in respect of the said Zemindari." Held, that, even if the estate was impartible, the arrangement embodied in the documents had not the effect of taking the Zemindari out of the category of joint or common family property so as to make it descendible otherwise than according to the rules of law applicable to such property and that it was nothing more in substance than an arrangement for the mode of enjoyment of the family property which did not alter the course of descent. The rule of Hindu law that it is competent to a member of a joint family to separate himself from the family by a clear and unequivocal intimation of his intention to sever applies equally to an impartible estate belonging to a joint family; but as in that case the person separating forfeits his chance of inheriting the whole of the estate by survivorship, it requires strong evidence to establish such separation.

Where all that appeared was that a village appertaining to an impartible estate was granted to a junior member of the family for maintenance, that the junior member himself did not go to reside at that village, but that after his death, his son, the plaintiff, went there, when the then holder of the estate was a minor and the estate was under the management of the Court of Wards, the effect of which change of residence necessarily effected a separation in food and mess, held that there was no separation of the joint family. It being established in the present case that this impartible estate was at one time the joint property of a family consisting of the descendants of the common ancestor of the defendant and the last holder it is in their Lordships' opinion incumbent on the plaintiff to adduce satisfactory grounds for holding that the joint ownership of the defendants' branch in this estate was determined so that it became the separate property of the last holder's branch. ———Partible property—Partition of—Effect of.

Once it is established—as it must now be taken to be—that for the purposes of succession an impartible estate may be joint family property, it is difficult to see upon what principle the fact that the members of the joint family or of any branch of the family have exercised their right of partition over their partible property should be held to divest them of their interest in the impartible estate over which they have no right of partition. It certainly cannot be put upon the ground of surrender or renunciation, for there is nothing in the fact of these partitions of their partible property to suggest any intention of renouncing their rights of succession to the impartible estate, nor do they receive any consideration for such renunciation. Further, to lay down that members of a joint family could not partition their partible property without losing their rights of succession in the impartible estate would impose on these families a restriction on the free right to partition which has been so fully recognised by the decisions of this Board in recent years. ———Partition of impartible estate and of other property —Junior members' suit for—Decree in, dismissing suit as regards former and directing partition of latter—Effect of.

In a suit for partition brought by a junior member of a family against his elder brother, the Court found that a considerable portion of the suit property, the zemindari estate of Challapalli was impartible, dismissed the suit with regard to it, and granted a decree for the partition of certain property, not forming part of the zemindary estate.

Held, that the family did not become a divided one in consequence of the proceedings in the said suit and that, as regards the impartible estate, the junior members retained such right and interest in respect of maintenance as belonged to the junior members of a raj or other impartible estate descendible to a single heir (156-7).

It is true that in the prior suit a decree was made for the partition of a portion of the family property, but it was a very inconsiderable portion, and had no relation whatever to the Zemindary estate, which was held to be impartible. ——— Partition of other property and giving up by junior member of claim to share in impartible estate as co-parcener —Deed evidencing—Effect of.

In 1831, B, the then holder of the talooka of Gungore died, and G, his eldest son, became entitled to it. On 31-1-1832, two documents, called deeds of partition, were executed and filed in the collectorate on the 9th of March, following. One was executed by the father of the appellant and his uncle S, and was, so far as was material, as follows :—

" Whereas the said B, proprietor and Zemindar, departed this life leaving him surviving his eldest son G, and us the declarants, his heirs ; consequently we, the declarants, of our own free will and accord, in accordance with the testament of our brother and father deceased, who while alive constituted the said G, conformably with family custom the proprietor and his successor, do hereby ingenuously declare as follows :—

HINDU LAW—(Contd.)

Impartible Estate — Joint Family Property—Estate forming—(Contd.)

SEPARATION AS REGARDS—(Contd.)

" Talooka Gungore, an ancestral estate, has been, in accordance with family custom, from time immemorial, held by one person, the eldest son, and the registered proprietor, from generation to generation ; and in case the registered proprietor dies without issue, the younger brother of the deceased or his eldest son becomes the rightful proprietor of talooka Gungore. The said G, is competent to present a petition and have his name enrolled as proprietor in the Collectorate Records by the removal of the name of B, deceased, in respect of the entire talooka aforesaid ; and, after payment of the Government revenue, to appropriate the produce thereof without allotting any shares, and any other participating therein. We the declarants have not, nor shall have, any claim, right, or demand in respect thereof. If ever we or our heirs hereafter, contrary to this deed, prefer any claim for co-partnership or shares in talooka Gungore aforesaid before the authorities for the time being, such claim shall be null and void, and of no effect."

The rest of that document related to other property, called P, as to which it was admitted that the three declarants were entitled to equal shares.

The other document was executed by G, and was, so far as was material, as follows :—

" Whereas B, my father, departed this life ; and whereas my late father, in accordance with the family custom which prevails with regard to talooka Gungore for the eldest son to succeed to the proprietorship after the death of the registered proprietor, constituted me the declarant in his lifetime the proprietor and his successor to the whole estate aforesaid and all properties ; accordingly, that is to say, in accordance with the will of the father and the family custom, talooka Gungore, the ancestral estate, has been in my possession without any other participating or having shares therein."

The rest related to the rights of the other declarants to the properties other than Gungore.

Held that the partition which took place in 1832 of the other property could not be held to have affected the character or the mode of descent of talooka Gungore (272).

The partition then made was clearly intended to be confined to the property which was then admitted to be partible ; and the clear intention of the parties was to leave the Talooka in the condition in which they found it. There is nothing in the transaction which evinces any intention on the part of the junior members of the family to part with or transfer any right or contingent right of property, which they might have ; they only admitted that they had no claim to share in Talooka Gungore as co-parceners (271-2).

Held further that a deed of 1852 by which a suit brought by one of the junior members against the holder of the estate was compromised had only the same effect (273). (Sir James W. Colvile.) CHOWDHRY CHINTAMUN SINGH v. MUSSAMMAT NOWLUKHO KONWARI.

In regard to an impartible estate it is clear that where an impartible Zemindary has been acquired by the last holder or his branch as a self-acquisition, the other undivided members of his family take no interest in it and it descends as the separate property of the acquirer. That was what happened in the Shivaganga case (1863) 9 M. I. A. 539. On the other hand, it is also well settled that as regards an impartible estate which was or had to be considered joint family property, a member of the joint family might become separate with regard to it so as to lose his right to succeed to it by survivorship. That is what happened in Periasami v. Periasami (1878) L. R. 5 I. A. 61 = I. L. R. 1 M. 312 (P. C.), where a member of the joint family, believing himself to be next in succession to the larger Zemindari of Shivagunga, joined in a settlement under which he was held to have renounced all claims to the lesser Zemindari. Or, again, an impartible Zemindari might by consent be settled on a particular branch of the family as their separate property as in Rangamayakamma v. Ramaiya (1879) 5 C. L. R. 439. ———Proof of—Estate itself if must be partitioned.

R, the holder of an impartible estate descendible by family custom by the rule of primogeniture but otherwise governed by the law of the Mithakshara, granted to his brother, B, a mokurruri patta of a part of the estate for the maintenance of B and his descendants. Subsequently B built a pucca house to the westward of the family house, established a tulsi pinda there, and removed his family to his pucca house, and lived there separately from R. As a fact B built a wall between his pucca house and the family house of R and established a separate thakurbari in his house. The houses were quite separate houses. After the grant a daughter of B's son was married and the expenses of the marriage were defrayed by B, the amount being raised by a mortgage of the lands which he held under the mokkurruri patta.

Held, reversing the High Court, that the evidence clearly proved that there had been complete separation between R and B in worship, in food, and in estate, and that there had been complete separation between them (201).

The High Court erred in thinking that there could have been no complete separation of the joint family, as the impartible estate itself had not been partitioned between R and B. B and his son had no co-parcenary rights in the impartible estate, and no rights in that estate which entitled them or either of them to a partition of the impartible estate (201). The suit related to the succession to an impartible estate in the Madras Presidency. The first plaintiff, the mother of the last holder, claimed the estate as the nearest heir to his separate property, while the defendant, who was a distant male agnate, claimed to succeed to it as joint family property. The estate was shown to have been once the joint family property of the defendant's branch and the last holder's branch. The question was whether the first plaintiff had adduced satisfactory evidence to establish that the joint ownership of the defendants' branch in the suit estate had been determined so that it had become the separate property of the last holder's branch. The evidence was to the effect that the members of the defendant's branch continued to live in the old family residence on a hill in houses closely adjoining the so-called palace of the jagirdar (holder of the estate), while the jagirdar ceased to reside in the hills and acquired a new residence more to his taste in the plains; that the position of the junior members was in no way altered; that they went on living as they did before, and continued to enjoy the privilege of cultivating the land free of the plough tax and poll tax levied on the other inhabitants, a privilege which in the primitive conditions obtaining in those hills was equivalent to maintenance; and that they also on such occasions as marriages, as members of the Jagirdar's family, received contributions from the inhabitants of the same kind as those received by the jagirdar himself.

Held, that the evidence was of a trivial and inconclusive kind and was insufficient to establish separation as regards the suit estate between the last holder's branch and the defendant's branch. There are undoubtedly strong reasons for concluding that G (the last holder of the Shivagunga Zemindary) and his brother, after the acquisition by the former of the Zemindary, lived very much as if they were separate. the question whether the Zemindari is partible or not is of no importance. Even if impartible it may still be part of the common family property and descendible as such, in which case the widow's estate of the appellant would be excluded. the Government. The respondent claimed the Zemindari on the ground that it was part of the joint property of his and the late Zemindar's family, and that he was entitled to the same to the exclusion of the widow. The widow pleaded, inter alia, that the Zemindari was separated estate in the hands of her husband, and that the suit was barred by limitation. With regard to the plea of limitation the judgment of the High Court was to the following effect :—

(1) That it was incumbent upon the appellant to show that her husband's, and his father's and grandfather's enjoyment of the Zemindary was not the enjoyment of a mere co-parcener, but was inconsistent with the rights asserted by the respondent ;

(2) That in their opinion the elder branch of the family did not assume the position of strangers to the rest of the family, but admitted the rights of the younger branch so far as their rights were compatible with the supposition that the Zemindari was impartible ; and (3) that the appellant had failed to show that her husband had by long possession acquired a title such as would by Hindu law descend to his widow, and had in fact proved no more than that her husband held the property as an impartible estate, and had not shown that there was any allegation of division or self-acquisition, and that, therefore, the plea of limitation failed (119-20).

As between the appellant and the respondent, the suit is not one for partition. The claim of the latter is not to hold jointly with the appellant, but to succeed adversely to her as one of the right heirs on the death of the late Zemindar. There has been no denial of the title of the respondent's ancestor and his family, or exclusion of them from the estate (127). (Lord Davey). Held, that the succession fell to be designated according to the ordinary rule of the Mitakshara law and, that the plaintiff being the person who in a joint family would, being the eldest of the senior branch, be the head of the family, was the person designated in the impartible raj to occupy the gaddi in preference to the defendants.

There are under the Mitakshara law only two possible lines of devolution and the only test to be applied is : Was there community or was there separation ? The arguments of the defendants would involve there being two tests, (1) Was the property joint or separate ? and (2) If it was joint, was it an impartible raj ? If this were right, there would have been no inquiry in the Shivaganga case whether the raj was self-acquired property or not. It would have been enough to take the admission that it was an impartible raj. (Lord Dunedin). BAIJNATH PRASHAD SINGH v. TEJ BALI SINGH.

———Separate property—Mithakshara rule of succession to—Applicability of, by reason of very fact of impartibility of estate.

It has been argued that the estate in question in this case being impartible, must, from its very nature, be taken to be separate estate, and consequently that, according to the decision in the "Shivagunga case," the succession to it is determinable by the law which regulates the succession to a separate estate, whether the family be divided or undivided (336-7).

The authority invoked, however, affords no ground for this argument. The decision in the "Shivagunga case" will be found to proceed solely and expressly on the finding of the Court, that the Zemindary in question was proved to be the self-acquired and separate property of Gowary Vallaba Tevar. It assumes that if this had not been so, the decision would have been the other way (337). It is therefore, clear, that the mere impartibility of the estate is not sufficient to make the succession to it follow the course of succession of separate estate (339). (*Sir James W. In the Shivaganga case, it was admitted that this would have been the course of descent according to the Mithakshara, if the property had been ancestral. The reason why in that case this Committee preferred the title of the daughter to that of the nephew of the last possessor, was, that the Shivagunga Raj was the separate acquisition of the deceased, and, therefore, passed according to the canon which regulates the descent of separate property, and not according to that which determines the succession to the joint or ancestral property of an undivided family (533-4). And the question was whether the Mithakshara law of succession had been so far modified by custom, with respect to that raj, as that failing lineal descendants of a deceased Rajah, his widow was entitled to succeed to the raj in preference to a collateral male heir who was also the eldest male member of the joint family.

Where the family, to which ancestral property held by a family custom of primogeniture belongs, is governed by the law of the Mitakshara, that law in the event of a holder dying without male issue would, if the family be undivided, give the succession to the next collateral male heir in preference to the widow or daughters of the last possessor (269).

Impartible Estate - Joint family property if may be.

———The normal state of every Hindu family is joint. Presumably every such family is joint in food, worship and estate. In the absence of proof of division, such is the legal presumption; but the members of the family may sever in all or any of these three things. The family in which a title to a kingdom exists in one member follows this general law but it follows it in part only, for the succession to a kingdom is an exception to it from the very nature of the thing. The family may have property distinct from that to which a sole heirship belongs, and may continue joint. Still when a Raj is enjoyed and inherited by one sole member of a family, it would be to introduce into the law, by judicial construction, a fiction, involving also a contradiction to call this separate ownership, though coming by inheritance, at once sole and joint ownership, and so to constitute a joint ownership with

Whether Oiya Thevar was a member of a joint family or a divided member, the estate of Padamattur must be taken to have descended to Muthu Vaduga, as ancestral estate. He would therefore necessarily be joint in that estate, so far as was consistent with its impartible character, with his two younger brothers, the latter taking such rights and interests in respect of maintenance and possible rights of succession as belong to the junior members of a joint Hindu family in the case of a raj or other impartible estate descendible to a single heir. K, the great grand father of the appellant and the grandfather of the respondent, bequeathed the whole of his zemindary to his eldest son, leaving a certain fixed stipend to each of his other children. The settlement upon the younger children was admitted to have been originally a fair one; but it was urged for the appellant that, in consequence of events which had subsequently occurred, there ought to be a reduction in the stipends originally fixed.

Held, that to be entitled to the relief prayed for the appellant should have made out clearly that the value of the zemindary had been reduced, and had been reduced not by any default of his own or of those through whom he claimed, but by an act of God.

The appellant, however, adduced no such proof, nor was there even an allegation by him to that effect. There was nothing but the vague, indefinite assertion, that by degrees the value of the zemindary had been reduced by a sale of some portion of it; but whether that sale had been occasioned by bad seasons, or by neglect of the person, or by any other cause, was nowhere alleged. It was not even alleged to have taken place in consequence of bad seasons.

That suit was dismissed as regards the impartible estate. They thereupon sued the holder for arrears of maintenance for 12 years prior to suit.

It was found that, though the prior suit for partition was dismissed as regards the impartible estate, the junior members acted in perfectly good faith in instituting the same. The defendant did not allege in his defence, nor was there any evidence, that he was in any way prejudiced by the form of the previous suit.

Held, that it was impossible to hold that the younger brothers of the defendant had forfeited their undoubted right to arrears of maintenance merely because they were in the first instance advised to institute a wrong suit, and did not claim their maintenance as it fell due.

The plaintiff, the son of an adopted son of the last male holder of a zemindari, which was by custom impartible and governed by the rule of primogeniture, sued the defendant, a devisee of the zemindari and other lands under the will of the last holder, for maintenance. The plaintiff's claim was rested, not on any custom affecting the suit zemindari which enjoined the making of grants of maintenance to any persons, nor on any relationship between him and the defendant, but on the fact that the zemindari, though impartible, was joint family property, and that he (plaintiff), as a junior member of the family of the last holder, had, under the general law, a right by birth to maintenance out of the zemindari, which right followed the property into the hands of a third party.

Held, affirming the High Court, that the plaintiff's claim was unsustainable.

An impartible zemindari is the creature of custom, and it is of its essence that no co-parcenary exists. This being so, the basis of the claim is gone, inasmuch as it is founded on the consideration that the plaintiff is a person who, if the zemindari were not impartible, would be entitled as of right to maintenance. The right to maintenance, so far as founded on or inseparable from the right of co-parcenary, begins where co-parcenary begins and ceases where co-parcenary ceases. In a suit by the plaintiff, the cousin of the 1st defendant, the Maharajah of Jeypore, for maintenance out of the impartible estate held by the defendant, the plaintiff rested his case upon the contention that, according to the general Hindu Law, he, as the son of a brother of the late Maharajah, was entitled to maintenance out of the estate. The defendant, in his written statement, proceeded more or less upon the same basis, but alleged a special custom which deprived the plaintiff of that which was treated as being his prima facie right. The issue framed in the case with regard to the custom alleged cast the onus of proving the same on the defendant. Held by their Lordships that the burden should have been put upon the plaintiff to prove the custom entitling him to maintenance, and not upon the defendant to prove a custom negativing the ordinary law.

An instrument, by which the holder of an impartible estate, gave certain properties to a junior member of his family, in lieu of the yearly sum of Rs. 210, formerly received by the latter for maintenance, took the form of a letter written by the junior member to the holder of the estate. It ran thus :—

"I shall get Rs. 210 annually for my food and other expenses. You should therefore cause it to be paid to me directly from the Sarkar—(1) land of the village of R; (2) old mango grove at Bhampur; (3) Mowha Grove of Rampur; (4) the house situate on the road in which I live. I shall be receiving as above and I will serve the Raj and will go wherever ordered. My descendants and I will enjoy it. In case there shall be no descendant from me it will lapse to the Raj. I will not give it to any one. I will not act against your pleasure".

Held, that the instrument was simply an agreement by the head of the family to devote certain portions of the family property to the maintenance of a junior member, that is, an alienation pro tanto of an impartible estate which every head of such a family not restrained from alienation by a family custom was entitled to make though the estate be impartible, and that the court below erred in treating the instrument as an example of the semi-hostile assertion by the younger members of a family of a right to a provision out of the family as a permanent settlement, in the shape of a portion of the estate. In order to carry out such arrangement the estate was purchased by the Government in revenue sale and a portion of the estate was given to the Nuzvid Zemindar and an adjustment was made through the mediation of Government with the other creditors by which the Tengallamudi Mutta was assigned in satisfaction of the claims of the younger branch upon the zemindar of Nidadavole for past and future maintenance. Some time after this adjustment, the Nuzvid Zemindar granted the estate of Chevendra in perpetuity to the same branch for a similar purpose, and a partition was effected among the different members of the younger branch with the privity of the Zemindars of Nuzvid and Nidadavole by which each of the two estates was allotted to the several members.

MAINTENANCE OF—(Contd.)

By the family custom of a Hindu Rajput family in the Bombay Presidency land granted out of the impartible family estate to younger sons for jivai or maintenance reverted to the estate upon a failure of the grantee's male descendants, widows being excluded from inheriting. The holder of such a jivai grant died in October 1903, leaving a widow, but no male issue. His widow remained in possession, and in March 1904, adopted a son to her deceased husband. In a suit by the estate-holder for the recovery of the village, the subject of the grant, on the ground that on the death of the last holder of the grant without male issue it reverted to him, held, reversing the High Court, that the grant did not revert to the estate-holder, but was inherited by the adopted son.

The contention that the grant reverts to the grantor's estate immediately the jivaidar dies is unsustainable. Admittedly a posthumous son would prevent the reversion. If the widow happened to be enciente the reversion naturally would remain in suspense until the birth of the child, to see whether it was a male or a female. Here the adoption was made within the period of natural gestation ; and the property was at the time of the adoption in the possession of the widow and still is in the possession of the adopted son. ———Grant of allowance for—Duration of — Allowance for maintenance of A, his younger brothers three in all, "and the rest of your family"—Issue of brothers if entitled to the allowance.

An agreement made between P, the then Zemindar of Pedda Kimidy, and J, the eldest son of P's younger brother, recited that there were disputes between the elder and younger branches of the family, and was in the following terms :—P agrees "to give (you)"—that is, J—" presently Rs. 10,000 so that neither you nor your younger brothers nor the members of your family may make any demand in future in respect of the household articles, jewels, etc., or anything, or in respect of the debts incurred by your deceased father." The next paragraph of the agreement was as follows:—"To give (you) through the Collector every month Rs. 300 on account of the maintenance of yourself, your younger brothers three in all, and the rest of your family. As we hereby agreed that you, your younger brothers and the other members of the family shall have no concern whatever henceforward in the said Zemindary or any other thing, you should enjoy the said towji "—that is allowance.

J and his two younger brothers died, and the plaintiff was the son of the youngest of them, apparently the only issue of the three.

In a suit brought by the plaintiff against the defendant, the son of P and the Zemindar for the time being of Pedda Kimidy, the question was whether the plaintiff was entitled to be paid out of the revenues of the Zemindary the allowance of Rs. 300 granted by the said agreement. The defendant contended that the payment of Rs. 300 a month was only to endure for the life of J, or at the most for the lives of three brothers.

Held, affirming the High Court, that the issue of the three brothers were intended to have the benefit of the provision for maintenance, and that the plaintiff, as the issue of one of the brothers, was entitled to be paid the amount of the same.

Either of the constructions put forward by the defendant is directly at variance with the terms of the agreement It cannot be reasonably suggested who is to be included in the expression "the rest of your family," unless the issue of the three brothers are to be included. MAINTENANCE OF—(Contd.)

By a sunnud, in the nature of a deed of maintenance, certain villages and lands were granted by a Zemindar in possession, to J, to hold "possession of the villages, and lands, etc., and support his dependants and relations from generation to generation." J was a member of the grantor's family.

Held, on a construction of the instrument, that J took an absolute estate in the property assigned to him, and could alienate it beyond the term of his own life.

The reference to maintenance was merely for the purpose of showing the consideration for the instrument, or the transaction. The instrument does not evince an intention that from son to son, the property granted should remain in the family ; with the head of the family for the time being, in order to enable him to afford the maintenance. Giving the land to a member of the family to whom it was given, had the same effect, and was an act of the same character as giving a sum of money to him absolutely, in lieu of any claim for maintenance burdened with the duty upon his part of maintaining those who ought to be maintained.

If that had been done, the money would have been absolutely the property of the person to whom it was given, and would have well discharged the duty incumbent upon the person who should have paid the same. The words "continue to hold and enjoy possession to us uninterruptedly from generation to generation" render this construction sufficiently certain. Every part of that portion of the deed appears to refer to the enjoyment of the land, and not the identity, or the persons, or the continuance of the persons of those who were to be maintained. ———Revenue and cesses due on villages allotted for—Enhancement of—Liability for—Compromise — Construction.

Plaintiff and defendant were members of a joint Hindu family, plaintiff being the head of the family and the proprietor of a taluka, and defendant being the representative of a junior branch. Disputes between the defendant and the plaintiff's father as to the former's claim upon the taluk were settled by a compromise which awarded 11 villages forming part of the taluk to the defendant and provided that the plaintiff's father was to pay out of his own pocket the Government revenue in respect of those villages, and that the defendant was to have no concern with the same. That compromise was embodied in a decree of court. The terms of the arrangement were entered in an administration paper, or wajib-ul-arz, of the talook before the settlement of 1867, in the record whereof they were also entered. And they were referred to in a sanad granted to the talookdar.

Held that, on the right of construction of the compromise, the talook vested in the plaintiff, subject to the right of the defendant to hold possession of the 11 villages on the terms specified in the wajib-ul-arz of 1867 ; and that, as between the plaintiff and the defendant, the plaintiff was liable for the Government jamma, and the defendant for the local rates and cesses levied on such villages or on the talook in respect of them.

All the judgments below proceed on the principle that the dispute between the parties is of the ordinary kind which occurs when the head of a family and a junior member cannot agree on the proper amount of maintenance. Courts have no jurisdiction to disturb compromises or settled arrangements of a permanent character on the ground that they were originally based on claims for maintenance. The principle adopted by the learned Judges below has no warrant in law unless it can be shown that the defendant's interest in the villages was of the variable character which belongs to an ordinary allowance for maintenance. To attribute that character to it is to misread the history of the case. (Lord Hobhouse.) LOKNATH v. BISSESSARNATH. (1899) 26 I. A. 268 (279-80) = 27 C. 103 (115-6) = 7 Sar. 569.

MAINTENANCE OF—(Contd.)

Just as the impartibility of an estate is the creature of custom, so custom may and does affirm a right to maintenance in certain members of the family. The failure to prove a special custom would not by itself be fatal in the case of some claims. When a custom or usage, whether in regard to a tenure or a contract or a family right, is repeatedly brought to the notice of the Courts of a country, the Courts may hold that custom or usage to be introduced into the law without the necessity of proof in each individual case. Their Lordships do not doubt that the right of sons to maintenance in an impartible zemindari has been so often recognised that it would not be necessary to prove the custom in each case. But their Lordships can find no invariable or certain custom that any below the first generation from the last Raja can claim maintenance as of right (154-5). That suit was dismissed as regards the impartible estate. They subsequently instituted the suit out of which the appeal arose for, inter alia, the recovery of arrears of maintenance for twelve years prior to suit.

The District Judge awarded arrears of maintenance for 12 years prior to suit on the ground that, although no demand had been made, maintenance must be deemed to have been withheld by the defendant, the holder of the estate, in view of his attitude in the prior suit and since, including his attitude in the several stages of the suit out of which the appeal arose.

CONFISCATION AND RE-GRANT OF ESTATE.

———Impartibility and descent of estate—Effect on.

Prior to 1802, the zemindary of Nuzvid formed part of an ancient and much larger estate which was indivisible and descendible to a single heir, and prior to the British rule it was a military Jaghir held on the tenure of military service, and in the nature of a raj or principality.

In 1772 V, who had succeeded to the estate, died, and was succeeded by his son N, who was proclaimed a rebel, and made a State prisoner in 1783. The entire estate was confiscated and resumed by Government, and in the year 1784 was restored to the eldest son of N, the rebel.

Held that it might be assumed that the estate, which was restored in its entirety, was restored as it existed prior to the confiscation, and that the rule as to impartibility and descent continued as before (43). ———Nature of estate in grantee's hands—Alteration of—Intention of Government as to—Inference of, from passing of general law 3 years after—Propriety of.

Mr. Field does not contend that if the estate granted to C in 1790 was a Raj, descendible by family custom, according to the rule of primogeniture, it lost that character on the passing of Regulation XI of 1793; but he insists on that Regulation as evidence of intention. He argues that, inasmuch as it was passed to reduce the number of estates descendible by special custom, the intention of the Government was, presumably, to make the property restored to C subject to the ordinary law of succession. Their Lordships, however, are of opinion, that they cannot safely draw any inference concerning the intentions of Government in making a particular grant in 1790, from the passing in 1793 of a general law which, confessedly, does not affect the descent of the large zemindaries held as Raj, or subject to Koolachar, or family custom (36-7). ———Nature of estate in grantee's hands—Alteration of, by subsequent executive act—Power of Government as to.

The Shivagunga zemindary, which was an ancient impartible estate, was granted to the istimrar zemindar by the Madras Government by a proclamation of July, 1801, the terms of which showed that the Government had no intention of altering the quality of the estate. In August, 1801, the Government installed him as ruler of the district.

Semble the istimrar zemindar having thus been placed in the old position of dignity and authority which his predecessors occupied, the Madras Government could not, by any executive act, alter that position (114).

Whether the Government had exercised an act of paramount power on the footing of reconquest after rebellion, or whether they were merely supplying a vacancy caused by escheat, they had in July, or at latest in August, 1801, perfected the act of appointment, and they could not undo it (114-5). Notwithstanding the fact that the grantee selected by Government after the escheat of the Shivagunga zamindary was a remote kinsman of the zemindar of the former line, it was held to be the necessary conclusion from the terms of the grant and the circumstances in which it was made that the zemindary was the self-acquired property of the grantee. ———The Zemindary of Hunsapore in Behar, was an impartible Raj, which by family usage and custom descended, for many generations, on the death of each successive Rajah, to his eldest male heir, according to the rule of primogeniture, subject to the burthen of making Babooana allowances to the junior members of the family for maintenance. In the year 1767, F, the then reigning Rajah of Hunsapore, having rebelled against the British Government, was expelled by force of arms, and the Raj confiscated by Government, who kept possession of the same for upwards of twenty years, and ultimately, in 1790, granted the Raj to C, a younger member of the family of F, on whom, some years afterwards, the Government conferred the title of Rajah. On a question arising as to whether the estate was the separate and self-acquired property of C, or was ancestral property in his hands, held, that the estate must be taken to have been the separate and self-acquired property of C (34).

On the facts, it is at least clear, that there was a virtual confiscation of the interest of F and his descendants in the property, and the assertion of full dominion over it on the part of the East India Company. The Government has not only persistently treated the estate of F as forfeited, and refused to recognise any claim on the part of his descendants; it has for more than twenty years applied the revenue to its own purposes; it held itself at liberty either to reject (as it ultimately rejected) the applicatlons of M, (the father of C,) or to make a fresh grant of the estate to him, imposing new conditions upon the tenure; it held itself at liberty in 1790 to dispose of the property by sale, though as a matter of grace and favour it finally conferred it on C (33). The fact that C was the member of the family which had so long held the estate, next in succession to the line of F, and the son and grandson of persons who had established claims on the gratitude of the company, may have been a motive determining the selection of him as grantee; but it does not affect the nature of his estate, or give to it the character of ancestral property. The legal foundation of his title is still the grant to him from those who had power to make or to withhold it. This point was ruled in the Shivagunga case (34). (*Sir James W. ———The holder of an impartible raj was driven out of the country for acts of rebellion. The Raj was thereupon seized by the East India company, and placed under the management of their officers. Held, that the portion in which the heir was reinstated thereupon became his self-acquired property, though with all the incidents of the family tenure of the old estate as an impartible raj.

It cannot be doubted that the grant to the members of the other branch of the family of the other portion of the raj was a direct exercise of sovereign authority and proceeded from grace and favour alone, and, if so, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the reinstatement of the heir of the former holder in a portion of his father's former estate also bore that character. ———Qualities of estate, including its impartible character—Alteration of—Intention as to—Evidence.

In or shortly before the year 1801, the lineal descendants of Sasivarna, the person to whom the Shivagunga Zemindary was originally granted, became extinct. Thereupon, certain ministers, who had for sometime before had the management and control of the Zemindary, maintained their position there by force, and broke out into open rebellion. Upon that the Madras Government issued a Proclamation, dated the 6th of July, 1801, by which they appointed one of the Tevar family, a collateral relative of Sasivarna, to be Zemindar. On the 22nd of April, 1803, a Sunnud was issued by the same Government, fixing the assessment of the Zemindary in accordance with the permanent settlement effected by Madras Regulation XXV of 1802. The terms of the Proclamation (which are set out on pp. 112—114 of their Lordships' judgment in 8 I. A.) showed that from the beginning to the end the Zemindary was referred to, not in its proprietary and private, but in its political and public aspect, that the intention of the Government was to instal the istimrar Zemindar not merely as proprietor but as ruler of the district, and that the policy of the Government clearly was to appoint a ruler whom the rebellious inhabitants would obey. The actual installation of the istimrar Zemindar was effected in August, 1801, the month after the Proclamation.

Held, that though the Madras Government were in a position to grant out the estate on other than the old terms, they did not in fact intend to alter the ancient qualities of the estate, including its character of impartibility (112, 114).

Whether they had exercised an act of paramount power on the footing of reconquest after rebellion, or whether they were merely supplying a vacancy created by escheat, they had in July, or at latest in August, 1801, perfected the act of appointment, and they could not undo it (114-5).

Held further that, even if the Proclamation of 1801, the Regulation of 1802, and the sunnud of 1803, were taken as together constituting one transaction, and the whole were read together, the conclusion would not be different, for the Proclamation only designated the individual Zemindar, while the Regulation and the Sunnud indicated the policy of the Government (which required the appointment of a ruler with authority in his hands) and the quality of his estate (115). ———Raj tenure—Estate in nature of, before confiscation—Re-grant of, as such tenure—Evidence—Title of Raja conferred upon grantee some years after re-grant—Effect—Value of.

The Hunsapore Raj was an impartible Raj, which by family usage and custom descended, for many generations, on the death of each successive Rajah, to his eldest male heir, according to the rule of primogeniture. In 1767, F, the then reigning Rajah, having rebelled against the British Government, was expelled by force of arms, and the Raj confiscated by Government, who kept possession of the same for upwards of 20 years, and ultimately in 1790, granted the Raj to C, a younger member of the family of F. The grant was in the first instance of the Zemindary without the title of Rajah, and that circumstance was relied upon in support of the contention that the Zemindary was not granted as a Raj tenure. The title of Rajah was, however, conferred upon C in 1837 upon his application, founded on the fact, that it had been enjoyed by his predecessors, and annexed to the Zemindary.

Held, that that act of the Government in 1837 could not alter the legal effect of what was actually done in 1790; but that the grant of the title on that representation at least showed that the Government of 1837 did not dissent from the construction which C, then put upon the acts of their predecessors 1790 (36). ———Succession to estate—Rule of, applicable before confiscation—Alteration or preservation of—Intention as to—Evidence.

Hunsapore was an impartible Raj, which by family usage and custom descended, for many generations, on the death of each successive Rajah, to his eldest male heir, according to the rule of primogeniture, subject to the burthen of making Babooana allowance to the junior members of the family for maintenance. In 1767, F, the then Raja of Hunsapore, having rebelled against the British Government, was expelled, and the Raj confiscated by Government. The Government kept possession of the Raj for upwards of 20 years, and ultimately, in 1790, granted it to C, a younger member of the family of F. Some years afterwards, the Government conferred upon C, the title of Raja.

Held, that the estate granted to C in 1790, was the Raj of Hunsapore, and that the right of succession to it from him was to be governed by the law or custom which regulated its descent in the time of his ancestors (37).

There was not in this, as in the Shivaganga case, a new Sanad. There is no evidence of the intention of the grantors, nor is there any manner of knowing the precise grounds on which the Government determined to confer the property on C. No doubt the term "Raj" is never used in the proceedings connected with the grant of the estate, and the subject of the grant is spoken of only as "the land in Hunsapore which belonged to Rajah F." On the other hand, there is no expressed intention to alter the nature of the tenure. The estate, whilst it was in the hands of the company, had never been broken (34-5). The intention to alter the quality of the estate, if it existed, would have been expressed. Again, the selection of a member of the old family, the next in succession to the excluded line, though it cannot make ancestral that which was self-acquired, is a very strong circumstance in favour of the hypothesis, that the intention of the Government was to restore the Zemindary as it had existed before the confiscation, making no further change than was involved in the forfeiture of the rights of F, and his descendants, and the substitution, by an act of power, of the person next in the order of succession (35-6). That the title of Raja was not granted with the Zemindary does not affect the position, because that title is not absolutely essential to the tenure of the estate as a Raj. Even as regards this matter, the fact that the title was, on C's application, conferred upon him in 1837, shows that the

The family in question was an ancient family, holding sway as independent Rajas. They were dispossessed by a neighbouring Raja in the 18th century, but having helped the English, they were reinstated by Warren Hastings. Their Lordships are satisfied that the re-instatement, which was finally carried out at a subsequent period, restored the family possession to what they had always been in ancient times—namely, an impartible raj or Zemindary, and that the Zemindary now is ancestral property and not self-acquired (200). EXECUTION SALE OF ESTATE—PURCHASE BY GOVERNMENT AT, AND GRANT TO A SON OF FORMER ZEMINDAR—EFFECT OF.

——Merangi Zemindari — Partible or impartible—Evidence.

Held, affirming the Courts below, that, assuming that impartibility was the rule at one time applicable to the Zemindari of Merangi, the subsequent dealings with the estate, the nature and terms of the grants under which it had been held throughout that century, the absence of proof of any usage or practice of impartibility in the succession to the estate, contrary to the ordinary Hindu law of succession, and the character of the estate, which was in no way distinguishable from an ordinary Zemindari subject to the payment of a fixed assessment of revenue, all clearly led to the conclusion that the Zemindari was at the date of suit a partible estate in a question of succession (53).

The Sannad-i-milkeat-istimirar of 1803 was in the ordinary terms of such grants. There is nothing in the circumstances under which that grant was made to lead to the inference that the Government had in view, in making this new grant, the creation of an impartible Zemindary, as an exception to the ordinary rule of succession of the Hindu law. The single circumstance that the property was given to a representative of an elder branch of the family formerly in possession, in preference to the representative of a younger branch who had been in arms against the Government, is of very little weight. Accordingly, even at this early date, in the beginning of the century, it appears that the Zemindari, if impartible before, became partible in a question of succession, as it became also subject to the disposition of the Zemindar by deed of transfer on sale or gift of the whole or part of the property (53).

In 1835, the Zemindary was exposed to public sale for payment of debt due by the Zemindar, and was purchased by the Government, who held it for sometime. During this time, the dewan of the former Zemindar, and certain of the doratanams, performed an important service to the Government, and, instead of the pecuniary reward which the Government had promised to them, they begged that a new grant of Zemindari might be given to the son of the former Zemindar, and the grant was accordingly made to that boy in the usual terms of a Sunnud-i-milkeat-istimrar, and his heirs, with the ordinary power of sale or disposal of the property in whole or in part. Here again for a second time, there was such a dealing with the estate, as in the circumstances, and having regard to the terms of the grant clearly shows that there was no intention to create an impartible estate, assuming there was power to do so, or to restore an estate previously impartible (53-4). ——Udayarpalayam Estate—Partible or Impartible.

The Zemindari of Udayarpalayam was in its origin admittedly impartible. Up to 1765 it was held by one member of the family only not being subject to the ordinary rule of Hindu Law. Between the year 1765 and the establishment of British rule in 1801, the fortunes of the family were of a very varied character. Throughout those troublous times, in turmoil or warfare, sometimes successful rebels, sometimes outcastes or exiles, the Poligars of Udayarpalayam maintained or asserted their claim to the possession of their ancestral estate.

On December 23, 1817, a Sanad in common form was granted to R, the Poligar of Udayarpalayam, conferring upon him the rights of a Zemindar under Regl. XXV of 1802 in 65 villages named in the Sanad. The Sanad was expressed to be granted in lieu of all former privileges. It declared that the grantee continuing to perform the specified stipulations and to perform the duties of allegiance to the British Government, its laws and regulations, was authorized and empowered to hold in perpetuity to his heirs, successors, and assigns at the permanent assessment therein named the Zemindary of Udayarpalayam. From the date of the grant of the Sanad to the date of suit the Zemindary was uniformly enjoyed as an impartible estate.

Held, affirming the High Court, that the estate was impartible, and descendible according to the rules of primogeniture (268).

The Zemindari of Udayarpalayam represents the ancient palayam of Udayar, and although for political reasons the estate has been circumscribed in extent, it is clear that it was granted and accepted as equivalent in value to the ancient palayam. On the cession of the Carnatic the British Government assured the Poligars, of whom the Poligar of Udayar was one, that they would enjoy every just and ascertained civil right, with a free exercise of the religious institutions and domestic usages of their ancestors. To this assurance the Government over and over again expressed a determination to adhere, although they deliberated long, and reconsidered their views more than once as to the precise arrangements to be made for the settlement of the country and the restoration of the Poligars (269). REVENUE ARREARS—RESUMPTION OF ESTATE FOR, DIVISION THEREOF INTO TWO ESTATES, AND GRANT OF ONE OF THEM UNDER SANAD.

———Partibility of and succession to, estate granted under Sanad.

The Zemindary of Nuzvid, prior to 1802, formed part of ancient and much larger estate which was indivisible and an descendible to a single heir, and prior to the British rule it was a military jaghir held on the tenure of military service, and in the nature of a raj or principality.

In 1783, N, the then holder of the estate, was proclaimed a rebel and made a state prisoner. The entire estate was confiscated and was resumed by Government, and in 1784 was restored to V, the eldest son of N. In 1793 the estate was again resumed by Government for arrears of revenue, and in 1802 two new Zemindaries were carved out of it, of which the Zemindari of Nuzvid was granted to R, the second son of N, and the other Nidadavolu was granted to V.

The provisions of the Sunnud under which Nuzvid was granted to R differed in no respect from those which are contained in every ordinary deed of permanent settlement; the feudal or military tenure was at an end; the 6 pergunnahs to which the Sunnud related became a new Zemindary subject only to the payment of a fixed land revenue, and subject to the ordinary stipulations and the performance of the duties ordinarily imposed on Zemindars. There was no State policy which required that the new estate of Nuzvid should be indivisible. On the other hand, cl. 7 of the Sunnud expressly provided that the grantee was to be at liberty to transfer, either by sale, gift, or otherwise, to whomsoever he pleased, his proprietary right in the whole or in any part of his Zemindary, and that such transfers should be valid, provided they were not repugnant to the Mahomedan or the Hindu Laws, or to the regulations of the British Government. Such transfers would have been repugnant to the Hindu or Mahomedan laws if they had been intended to be limited to the eldest son or other single heir. Cl. 15 of the Sunnud provided that the grantee was to hold the Zemindary in perpetuity to his heirs, successors, and assigns, at the permanent assessment therein named.

Held, that on the proper construction of the Sunnud of 1802, granting the Nuzvid Zemindary, that the Zemindary thereby created for the first time was not impartible or descendible otherwise than according to the ordinary rule of the Hindu Law (50).

By the limitation to the heirs in cl. 15 of the Sunnud, the ———Estate not separate property in hands of usurper—Rule as to confiscation and re-grant inapplicable to such a case.

USURPATION OF ESTATE BY ANOTHER MEMBER OF FAMILY WITH AID OF SUPERIOR—RECOGNITION OF USURPER BY SUPERIOR—EFFECT OF.

A Mansubdary Talook was held by a joint Hindu family under a grant from the zemindar. By the custom of the family, the Talook was impartible and descendible to a single heir. One of the members of the family took forcible possession of the Talook, and refused to pay the zemindar's revenue. He was ousted out of possession by the zemindar by the aid of A, another member of the family, whom the zemindar recognised and put in possession, and afterwards entered into an agreement with him to pay the revenue. There was no division of the family. Held, that the estate had not thereby become the self-acquisition or separate property of A.

There is a clear distinction between the Shivaganga case and the present case. In the "Shivagunga case" the zemindary had escheated to Government, which was free to deal with it as it chose. By a new sunnud it granted to the Taver, conferring a legal title which none could dispute. In the present case, on the other hand, there was no legal forfeiture; no fresh grant by any person competent to grant a legal title. The evidence only shows that on a dispute between the holder of the estate and the superior, another member of the family came in, and with the strong hand, and in concert with the superior, succeeded in ousting the holder, and in assuming the position and rights of the zemindar (340-2). No doubt one of the ways in which impartible estates may originate is by independent Chiefs or feudatories, exercising almost autocratic powers, being gradually in the course of time reduced by a paramount power to the position of ordinary zemindars ; but these impartible estates may also owe their origin to family arrangements followed up in practice for many generations, whereby it was originally agreed that the family property should be impartible and be held and managed for the benefit of the whole family by a single member at a time in a certain order of succession, the other members being entitled to maintenance only, without any power of interference with the management. Held, that there was no reason why the enam villages so granted should not be governed by the general principles of the Hindu law respecting partition of the father's estate among his heirs, and that the division must be according to the Hindu law.

———Enam village granted by Peishwa to Brahmin brothers in consideration of religious services.

The village of A, was granted in 1762-3 by the Peishwa to six brothers, who were Brahmins, in consideration of their devotion to religious worship, and the arduous services performed by the youngest brother, C. The grant did not declare the property to be impartible, nor did it say anything about the management of the village, but, in fact, C acted as manager, paying his brothers their share of the income. Afterwards the village was attached, but ultimately in 1800, the attachment was removed, and the Peishwa regranted or continued the inam to C's son. Having thus got into possession, he attempted to appropriate the whole income and refused to recognise the interest of the five elder brothers. The representatives of the elder brothers preferred a complaint to the Peishwa, from which it appeared that the brothers had then become separate. An inquiry followed, and an order was made to the effect that in future the representatives of all six brothers should receive equal shares. The management, however, was left in the hands of C's son, and notwithstanding some disputes, it afterwards remained in the hands of that branch of the family. Two yadis filed in the case, however, shewed conclusively that it was by the consent of the other co-sharers that the management was continued in C's line.

Held, affirming the High Court, that the inam village was partible property.

The Palayam of Kannivadi was originally held on military service tenure and subject to the payment of a tribute to the paramount power. In 1895, the appellant's grandfather, the palayagar, for the time, mortgaged villages of the palayam for debts previously incurred by him but not binding upon the appellant or upon the palayam. In 1900 the villages were bought by the mortgagees at a sale held in execution of the decree on the mortgage. No permanent settlement had been made with the Palayagar, but in 1905 one was made with the alienees.

In a suit by the appellant for the recovery of the villages sold in execution of the decree on the ground that the palayam was inalienable, it was found that the tenure of military service under which the Palayam had been held had been abolished and determined by the proclamation of the 1st December, 1801.

Held, that in 1895 the Palayam of Kunnivadi was not inalienable, and that the then Palayagar had power to alienate it to suit his own purposes. (311-2)

It does not at all follow from the fact that on the death of a poligar an application was made to Government for the recognition of the successor that he had not an hereditary estate. It was extremely common in Bengal, before the acquisition of the Dewanny, where a tenure was in fact hereditary from father to son, to take out a new sunnud upon each descent. So also it appears that upon a transfer of title to lands in Calcutta, either by alienation or descent, a fresh pottah was given to the new-holder ; but that was merely a fiscal regulation, and the pottah formed no part of the holder's title (312). ORIGIN, NATURE AND INCIDENTS OF—(Contd.)

A polliam is explained in Wilson's Ghossary to be a tract of country subject to a petty chieftain. In speaking of poligars he describes them as having been originally petty chieftains, occupying usually tracts of hill or forest, subject to pay tribute and service to the paramount state, but seldom paying either, and more or less independent, but as having at present, since the subjugation of the country by the East India Company, subsided into peaceable land-holders. This corresponds with the account read at the Bar from the Report of the Select Committee on the Affairs of India in 1812. A polliam is in the nature of a Raj; it may belong to an undivided family, but it is not the subject of partition, it can be held by only one member of the family at a time, who is styled the poligar, the other members of the family being entitled to a maintenance or allowance out of the estate. Where the question was whether the Palayam of Kannivadi was held under a tenure of the Palayagar rendering police service to the state and the only sanads ever shown to have been granted to any Palayagar of Kannivadi contained conditions by which the Palayagar was bound to protect the inhabitants by preventing as far as might be in the power of the Palayagar, robberies, depredations, etc., in their properties, to deliver up persons guilty of murder, and not to give shelter to deserters, and to apprehend and deliver them to the Collector, held, that the conditions were similar to the duties which all landholders and zamindars in British India had to perform, and that there was nothing in either of the Sanads from which it could be inferred that the Palayam was held on a tenure of rendering police duties to the State. POLICY OF GOVERNMENT IN REGARD TO.

The State policy with regard to palayagars was definitely announced by the proclamation of Lord Clive in 1801. To all intents and purposes the palayagars were relieved of military duties; they had to give up possession of firearms and weapons of offence and become zamindars; a certain number of pikemen whose names were to be registered were allowed to these chieftains in deference to their personal feelings and "for the purpose of maintaining the pomp and state heretofore attached to the persons of the said palayagars." The meaning of the proclamation is that their estates were subjected to assessment "upon the principles of zamindar tenures." Palayagars so treated were dealt with as zamindars with hereditary estates, their ancestors' possessions being secured to them. (Lord Shaw.) VENKATA JAGANNADHA v. VEERABHADRAYYA.

POLIGAR—RELATIONSHIP TO DECEASED—STATUS OF FAMILY OF PLAINTIFF AND OF DECEASED—EVIDENCE—(Contd.)

The plaintiff claimed to be entitled to succeed to a Polliem as against the widow of its last holder who had died without male issue. His case was that the Polliem was ancestral property ; that it belonged to the undivided family of himself and the deceased ; and that on the death of the last possessor the right to the Polliem vested in the plaintiff as the next male heir of the family in preference to the widow. The widow denied that the plaintiff and her husband were related at all, and alleged that in any event they were not members of an undivided family.

When the East India Co., took possession of the Polliems, including the suit one, in 1802, they made allowances out of the proceeds to the families of the Polligars, and contemplated the restoration at a future time, when order should have been established in the country, of the property so seized to its owners. To give effect to these views, they procured and forwarded a statement of the particulars of the property so seized, and of the names and families of the existing Polligars. They required returns to be made by the Polligars of those particulars. On that occasion a return was made by the then Polligar of the suit polliem. To prove his case the plaintiff obtained and filed a copy of that return, authenticated by the signature of the Collector of Chittoor, to whose office the ruturn purported to be sent. The accuracy of the copy so produced, and the genuineness of the document, were made out beyond all controversy. And it established beyond doubt that the plaintiff and the deceased were members of the same family ; that the suit Polliem was ancestral ; and that the plaintiff and the deceased were at the date of that document members of an undivided family.

Held, that the copy was an authenticated copy of a public document, and that it established the case of the plaintiff, unless it could be made out that the family, undivided at that time, became afterwards divided (91-2). ———Partible or Impartible.

The question was whether the Shivagunga Zemindary was a partible or an impartible estate.

The evidence of the nature of the Zemindary was this: that it belonged to a class of possesions which were in the nature of chieftainships, and impartible; that the great Zemindary of Ramnad out of which it was taken was impartible; that the small Zemindary of Padamattur which was taken out of it was impartible; that, according to family tradition and belief, it was impartible; and that from its first creation until the date on which the question arose it had passed from hand to hand as if it were impartible.

Held, that the evidence irresistibly led to the conclusion that the Zemindary was impartible (111-2). (Sir Arthur Hobhouse.) MUTTU VADUGANDHA TEVAR v. DORASINGA TEVAR. (1881) 8 I. A. 99 = 3 M. 290 (303-4) = 4 Sar. 239.

———Partibility of—Admission by istimrar zemindar of—What amounts to.

The question was whether the Shivagunga Zemindary was or was not an impartible estate.

It appeared that in 1822 the istimrar zemindar was asked by the Collector of the district whether it was customary for the zemindar to divide the estate between his children, what would be his motives, and what his authority for a division, and that he did not answer the first or third questions at all, and merely said that, "from motives of regard to the children, the zemindar divides the estate between them."

Held, that the answer was extremely ambiguous and evasive, and that a contention as to the partibility of the estate could not be built upon such an answer (110-1).

The answer is at the utmost a contention that the estate is alienable by the zemindar, and that he has a discretion to divide it; not that it is partible if not divided by him (111). The question was whether the Mitakshara law of succession had been so far modified by custom, with respect to the ancestral raj of Bhara, as that failing lineal descendants of a deceased Rajah, his widow was entitled to succeed to the raj in preference to the plaintiff, who was a collateral male heir and the eldest male member of the joint family.

To prove the said custom, cases of the succession of a widow to the exclusion of collateral male heirs in Mirzapore and in Cawnpore were relied upon. No connection between them and Bhara was, however, shewn to exist.

Held, that such cases, even if they could have any weight, were not admissible as evidence to prove a family custom in Bhara (163).

Quaere, whether evidence of a custom of descent in another estate which was carved out of the same estate as the Raj Bhara would be admissible in support of a similar custom in the Raj Bhara (158). (Sir Barnes Peacock.) RAJAH RUP SINGH v. RANI BAISNI.

Judge to be an existing operative custom was at some time or other existing as an operative binding custom. Where they differed from him apparently was that they held that the custom, though once existing and operative, had ceased to be so, either because the primitive conditions out of which it sprung had ceased to exist, and therefore cessat ratio cessat lex, or because owing to the improvement in education and the spread of socialistic opinions consequent thereon, the custom had been so gradually but steadily and persistently encroached upon that it had, as it were, been eaten away, and had ceased to be observed or applied.

Held, that a family might agree expressly or impliedly to continue to observe a custom necessitated by the condition of things existing in primitive times, after that condition had completely altered, and that, therefore, the principle embodied in the expression cessat ratio cessat lex did not apply where the custom outlived the condition of things which gave it birth.

FULL BLOOD AND HALF BLOOD.

———Preference of Hindu law as regards—Applicability.

It was contended that the preference under the general Hindu law of whole blood to half blood does not extend to a Raj, and to support this contention reliance was placed on the rule which obtains in certain cases of undivided ancestal estate, when brothers of the whole and half blood are on the same footing. The rule which was insisted upon is this, that in the case of a Raj or kingdom, or other impartible estate descending by inheritance to a sole heir, the court must view the property as though it were joint estate, part of an undivided joint ancestral estate, and apply the law applicable to such an estate, with a view to the selection of the eldest from those who would be equal in degree as coparceners. The High Court treated this position as novel and unknown to them and rejected it.

The confirmation by this Board of the decision of the High Court of Madras in the Marungapury case has since established that there was no legal foundation for this pretension on the part of Government ; and it must now be taken to be settled law that the title to the zemindary is to be determined by the ordinary law of succession in like cases (170). OBSTRUCTED INHERITANCE—DEVOLUTION OF.

———Two courses of, under Mitakshara law—Applicability of, to impartible estate.

The Mitakshara law recognises two courses of devolution in the case of what is called "obstructed inheritance" —the ancestral property descending in one channel, the self-acquired property in another Even where the estate is impartible, the distinction in the course of descent is recognised (281). For example, where the owner of an ancestral impartible estate, possessed also of self-acquired properties, dies leaving lineal male descendants, as the inheritance is "unobstructed," both classes of property go to them ; supposing, however, he were to die leaving no male progeny in the direct line, but a widow and a divided agnatic relation, in the absence of a custom the self-acquired property would go to the widow, whilst the estate would devolve on the agnatic line. The onus of establishing a custom dehors the ordinary rule in such a case would lie on the person asserting it (281-2). (Mr. Ameer Ali). MURTAZA HUSSAIN KHAN v. MD. YASIN ALI. ———Custom of—Nature of—Deed recording—Construction—Death of registered proprietor "without issue"—Devolution of estate in event of, on his younger brother or his eldest son—Provision for—Effect—Issue means issue in male line.

In regard to an estate the succession to which was governed by a family custom of primogeniture, the nature of the family custom was thus referred to in a deed executed by the junior members of the family in favour of the then holder of the estate :—"Talooka Gungore, an ancestral estate, has been, in accordance with family custom from time immemorial, held by one person, the eldest son and the registered proprietor, from generation to generation, and in case the registered proprietor dies without issue, the younger brother of the deceased or his eldest son becomes the rightful proprietor of talooka Gungore."

It was contended that the usage limited the succession to the eldest son of the recorded owner, or, if he died without issue, then to his younger brother or brother's son ; that there was no evidence of any custom beyond those limits ; and that the last owner having died without a son or brother or brother's son, the custom as proved could not be held to modify the ordinary law of inheritance applicable to those circumstances.

Held that, in the statement of the family customs in the said deed, it was not intended to confine the passing over of the whole, in the event of the proprietor dying without issue, to a younger brother of the deceased or his eldest son, and further, that the words "without issue" must be taken to import "issue in the male line" (272).

In a document between Hindus, and indeed in the Mitakshara itself, it is by no means unusual to find that the leading member of a class is alone mentioned when it is intended to comprehend the whole class. Accordingly the real effect of the definition of the family custom in the deed referred to above was that the property was ancestral property ; that, though ancestral property, it was held by special custom by one person at the time according to the rule of primogeniture, with a provision that where the direct male line failed it should then go over to the collateral lines (272). ———Custom of, applicable to lands appertaining to chief—Civil and criminal powers of chief—Withdrawal by Government of—Acquisitions of chief subsequent to—Applicability of custom to.

In a suit brought by the younger sons of the last holder of the Kunjpura estate against their eldest brother for partition of the said estate, the defendant pleaded that the estate was an impartible riasat or principality which had been recognised as such by the sovereign power, and which had descended under a custom of primogeniture, and that the plaintiffs had no title beyond a claim to maintenance.

The Court below found in favour of the custom set up by the defendant, and held that it applied to all property that appertained to the riasat prior to 1849. In that year the Government withdrew from the chiefs of Kunjpura the quasi-sovereign powers they had till then exercised. The Court below was of opinion that in consequence of that withdrawal the chiefship ceased as an independent entity and that the lands and property acquired by the Nawab after 1849 were not subject to the same rule of succession as had applied to "lands which once appertained to the chief as chief." The Court below accordingly decreed the plaintiffs' claim in respect of the properties acquired subsequent to 1849.

Held, dissenting from the Court below, that the custom found applied equally to acquisitions made after 1849.

There is nothing to show that the Government, in withdrawing the civil and criminal powers the Chiefs had hitherto exercised, intended to make any alteration in their status or to vary the rule which had governed the succession to the Kunjpur estate. The withdrawal of those powers was no doubt due to the needs of administration, but that circumstance cannot affect the custom under which the entire estate descended by the rule of primogeniture to a single male heir (95). In a case in which the question was whether the rule of succession in a family holding an impartible estate descendible to a single heir was lineal primogeniture, it appeared that the grandfather of the last owner made, when he was the ruling Raja, a statement or return in answer to an official requisition on a printed form. The statement or return was a clear statement of succession as regards the Raja's own sons. In dealing with more remote relations the Raja did not arrange the members of his family in any intelligible order of succession. Indeed the heading of the column in which the relationship of those persons was stated did not require that the names entered therein should be arranged according to their order of succession to the estate. The heading simply required that there should be written how many sons, how many brothers and brothers' sons, the zemindar had, and amongst them who were near and who were remote, and by how many generations remote, with particulars.

That statement or return was principally relied upon against the contention that the rule of succession was lineal primogeniture. The High Court treated the document as an important document, but declined to accept it as laying down any positive rule of succession in the family.

Held that the learned Judges of the High Court acted rightly in the matter. (Lord Macnaghten.) MOHESH CHUNDER DHAL v. SATRUGHAN DHAL.

According to the decision in the Shivagunga case, the fact of the Raj being impartible does not affect the rule of succession. ———In considering who is to succeed on the death of the holder of an impartible estate, the first principle is that a rule of decision in regard to succession to impartible property is to be found in the Mithakshara law applicable to partible property, subject to such modifications as naturally flow from the character of the property as an impartible estate. The second principle is that the only modification which impartibility suggests in regard to the right of succession is the existence of a special rule for the selection of a single heir when there are several heirs of the same class who would be entitled to succeed to the property if it were partible under the general Hindu law. We have first to ascertain the class, and we have next to select the single heir applying the special rule. (Lord Collins.) PARBATI KUNWAR v. CHUNDUR PAL KUNWAR.

———First-born son of fourth wife—Later-born son of third wife married after death without issue of former wives—Wives of same class or caste—Wives of different castes—Distinction.

Held, that as between the appellant, the son of the third wife of a poligar, whose marriage took place after the death without issue of the two former wives, and the respondent, the son of his fourth wife but born before the appellant, the latter was entitled to succeed to his father's estate in preference to the former, in a case in which their mothers were of the same class (7-8).

The preference which has been given to the first-born son over his brothers, irrespective of the priority of the marriages of their mothers, mainly depends upon the religious rules which guide the Hindu community. The principle deduced from the rules above mentioned, and the reasons upon which their Lordships' judgment in the case of Ramalakshmi Ammal (14 M. I. A. 570) are founded, apply with equal force to the first-born son of his father, whether born of a first-married wife or of a junior wife (4-5). The reasons on which the precedence and privileges of the first wife over her co-wives are founded are scarcely pertinent to the succession of sons to their father, which is governed by other considerations (7).

The suit related to the succession to the impartible estate of Urcadu in the Tinnevelly District and the question was whether there existed amongst the Zemindars of the District a custom by which the son of the senior wife, though younger, was entitled to succeed in preference to an earlier-born son of a junior wife.

In 1849, the Board of Revenue acting as the Court of Wards desiring to know which of the two minor sons of the Zemindar of Parayur, was to succeed him, requested the Collector of Tinnevelly and Madura to ascertain the rule of succession "as regards sons by different wives," and it appeared from the Collector's letter to the Secretary of the Board that the opinions of 20 Zemindars and the Poligars were collected, copies of which he sent, giving also, at the same time, an abstract of them in his letter. The Court of Wards acted upon the opinions thus obtained.

The Zemindars who gave their opinions as above stated or some of them could have been called as witnesses in support of the custom set-up. But not only were none examined but even their written opinions, as they gave them, were not produced. The only evidence offered of those opinions was the Collector's letter and summary above referred to.

Held, that the Collector's letter and summary was not properly admissible, and if received, could not be safely relied on as affording clear and unambiguous proof of the existence of an ancient and invariable custom in the district (5). G, however, entered upon the Zemindari at the date of the Sunnud, and he and his descendants had enjoyed it ever since. There was no secrecy about his appointment to be Zemindar. The matter was the subject of public proclamation, and W must have known, and all his descendants must have known, that the Sunnud granting the Zemindary was in the name of G, and the Zemindari was actually occupied and enjoyed by G and his descendants.

With regard to the custom of the appointment of a Jobraj by a reigning Rajah of Tipperah, the question was whether, as contended by the appellant, the reigning Rajah was bound to appoint a Jobraj partly on account of an alleged promise or intention on the part of the former Rajah, and partly on the ground that he was the oldest living member of the class out of which, according to the family custom, a Jobraj could alone be selected, or whether, according to the respondent's contention, the choice of the reigning Rajah, at least within a certain class, was absolutely free, and could not be controlled by the wishes of a former Rajah. The appellant's preferential title by seniority to the Jobrajship was sought to be established by evidence of a family custom to be collected from the instances given in the genealogy of actual successions.

Held, however, that where there was evidence of a power of selection the actual observance of seniority even in a considerable series of successions could not of itself defeat a custom which established the right of free choice (538). fact of the usage prevailing that the reigning Raja has the power of abdicating, and by deed assigning the Raj in favour of his eldest son or next immediate male heir, and that such usage was proved beyond all controversy to have prevailed in that country, and to have been acted upon in the instance in question (193). A Baboo allowance is a provision for younger sons, as an appanage of the Zemindary of Tirhoot (178). Where an estate is granted to a younger son as a Baboo allowance, he continues to pay the rent and assessment to the Raja; the property is never separated from the Zemindary at all. The cases, therefore, of absolute grants, and of grants by way of Baboo allowance, are essentially different in their nature. Properties entirely transferred under a deed of grant would be transferred as such in the Collector's Books into the names of those persons to whom they were given. If they are made as Baboo allowances, they will be described in the Collector's Books as Baboo allowances, and the owners of those Baboo allowances will have to pay the revenue, not to the Government, but to the Raja in whose Principality the property is situate (197). This contest is in truth a contest as to the title to reign. Into such disputes, passions stronger than those which affect the minds of ordinary litigants may well be supposed to enter, and fear and favour may sway in an unusual degree the minds of those who depose on either side. The power of an absolute Prince over the fate of those who surround him may enable him to carry a body of witnesses deposing to facts to which it may be difficult to offer any positive contradiction. The addition by false testimony of an incident or two, or of a few words, to an actual scene or ceremony, may, if credited, determine the title to a throne; and it is scarcely possible to conceive a case more requiring than this does, the nicest scrutiny and examination of the evidence. An impartible Zemindary having been mortgaged, the Zemindar, with other members of the joint family, including the defendant, his then presumptive heir, executed on November 4, 1882, a deedpoll addressed to the mortgagee which recited that a portion of the mortgage amount was borrowed in order that it might be paid as a recompense to the Zemindar for his transferring even then the right to the Zemin to the defendant and his addressing an arzi to the Collector stating the said fact. The deed, after reciting that the mortgaged properties had been conveyed to the mortgagee to be enjoyed by him in lieu of interest, provid ed that on payment at the end of any fusli by all the executants jointly or by the defendant of the amount due under the mortgage, the mortgagee should transfer the mortgaged properties to the defendant.

The arzis contemplated in the deed were presented by the Zemindar to the effect that he had transferred to the defendant the right to the Zemindary and all other possessions and had delivered the same into his hands, and that the name of the defendant might be entered in the register and that orders might in future be issued for conducting all the revenue proceedings through the defendant as the Zemindar.

Mutation of names in the Collector's books was effected in the year 1888; though possession of the mortgaged properties had always been with the mortgagee, and it did not appear that the Zemindar was ever put out of possession of the other property.

Held, that, though there might have been an intention on the part of the Zemindar to transfer the Zemin and other properties to the defendant, it never was effected in the mode required by law; and that the defendant could not, as against the heir of the Zemindar, call for implement of the intention, because he failed to shew any contract founded on valuable consideration (55).

It is not disputed that according to the law established at this time such a transfer could not be effected except by a registered deed. The arzis and the statement made to the Collector clearly do not bear any such character. Even if a complete change had been effected as regards mutation of names in the Collector's books and as regards delivery of possession, it would at the utmost do no more than give a starting point for the law of limitation. It would not supply the conditions of the law of transfer (53). (Lord Hobhouse.) IMMUDIPATTAM THIRUGNANA v. PERIYA DORASAMI. (1900) 28 I. A. 46 = 24 M. 377 (383-5) = 5 C. W. In a suit to recover an impartible Zemindary, the defendant pleaded a contract for valuable consideration between plaintiff's predecessor in title and himself to transfer the Zemindary to him. Held, that the deed was both in form and substance a transaction between the family and the mortgagee for the purpose of strengthening his title and not between the several members of the family and that it did not evidence a contract between the Zemindar and the defendant which the latter could enforce (54). The ekrarnamah ran as follows:—

"I therefore, in order to safeguard against the loss which the said Munshi" (the respondent) "may sustain, if perchance he vacates this post" (that is, the managership of the estate) "for any reason in future, I think it just and proper that if in future the said Munshi gives up this service for any reason....., he, the said Munshi, shall get Rs. 500 monthly as pension for life from the date he resigns the post of manager of the Dumraon Raj, and I hope that by allowing this (torn) if perchance he, according to his desire, reverts to the profession of pleadership, he shall get to some extent compensation for the loss he may sustain for leaving his profession after (? for) a longtime, and he will pass his old age in comfort. The heirs and representatives of me, the executant, and the Gaddinashin and administrators of the Dumraon Raj should fully comply with the (terms of) this deed."

Held that the ekrarnama was not in terms a contract binding the executor or administrators of B, the widow, to pay the pension, nor could it be said that it was a binding contract on the owner or administrators of the Dumraon Raj to pay such a pension.

The words "should fully comply with the terms of this deed" are not a binding promise to pay such a pension, but only a recommendation by the lady to two different parties to comply with the deed, i.e., to pay the pension. If it had been intended to provide that the pension was to be a right of the respondent to obtain this money, the words are surely insufficient to effect such an intention. The words are that they "should fully comply" with the terms of the deed. She did not treat, therefore, the ekrarnama as an ordinary contract. Inheritance—Ancestral and self-acquired or separate properties—Devolution of, under Mithakshara law.

The Mithakshara law recognises two courses of devolution in the case of what is called "obstructed inheritance"—the ancestral property descending in one channel, the self-acquired property in another (281). (Mr. Ameer Ali.) MURTAZA HUSAIN KHAN v. MAHOMED YASIN ALI.

The word "bandhu" has, in the system of Mithakshara, a distinctive and technical meaning, and signifies the Bhinna-gotra sapindas (306). It implies a relation belonging to a different family but entitled by Sapinda-relationship (308). (Mr. Ameer Ali.) RAMACHANDRA MARTANDA WAIKAR v. VINAYAK VENKATESH KOTHAKAR.

———Class of—Division of each, into cognates ex parte paterna and cognates ex parte materna and preference of former to latter—Propriety of.

Recent writers on Hindu law have divided each class of bandhus into two sub-classes respectively designated as cognates ex parte paterna, and cognates ex parte materna. The sub-division is evidently based on an inference from the order in which the several bandhus are mentioned in the illustrative enumeration. For instance, among the atma-bandhus enumerated, the name of the father's sisters son is first given ; then comes the mother's sister's son ; and after him the son of the mother's brother. Similarly, among the specifically named pitru-bandhus first comes the son of the father's paternal aunt, and amoung matru-bandhus the son of the mother's paternal aunt. From this it has been inferred that the expounder of the rule in question intended that each class should be divided into two sub-classes according to the side of relationship, and that in every case preference should be given to the father's side. Quaere, how far this proposition is in conformity with the express rule that in each class propinquity should be the governing factor (359). In families governed by the law of the Mithakshara the right of succession amongst the three classes of bandhus mentioned in Ch II, S. 6 of the Mithakshara is governed by the propinquity of the class; accordingly a pitri-bandhu does not succeed until the class of atma-bandhus is exhausted, and a matri-bandhu does not succeed uutil the classes of atma bandhus and pitri-bandhus are exhausted. The rule of the Mithakshara, in preferring the nearer to the more remote class of bandhus, is not dependent on individual propinquity or on the efficacy of offerings to a deceased person (94-5). ———Heritable right of—Basis of, under Mithakshara—Sapinda-relationship—Meaning of—Mutuality of sapinda-relationship—Necessity.

The right of inheritance is founded on Sapinda-relationship, which, under the Mithakshara-means consanguinity, in a distinct legal sense clearly explained by the author. This bond comes to an end with the fifth degree when the descent is through a female. It seems difficult to conceive that the right to inherit should continue after the relationship on which it is founded, and which gives it birth, has come to an end (310-1).

The Sapinda-relationship, on which the heritable right of collaterals is founded, ceases in the case of the Bhinna-gotra Sapinda with the fifth degree from the common ancestor; in order to entitle a man to succeed to the inheritance of another he must be so related to the latter that they are Sapindas of each other, in other words, there must be a mutuality of Sapinda-relationship between the propositus and his heritable Sapindas (311-2). In I. L. R. 45 B. 353, the principle that among bandhus the male is entitled to preference over the female—even though the latter is nearer in degree—was accepted as being law for the Bombay Presidency as much as for the Madras Presidency; and preference was given to a mother's sister's son over a brother's daughter. In that particular case the actual decision would appear to conflict with I. L. R. 26 B. 710, because it apparently ignored the supposed prior and paramount claim of paternal over maternal bandhus. Whenever therefore the two conflicting principles of preference of the paternal over the maternal line and preference of the male over the female sex, in the Presidency of Bombay,

By the general Hindu Law B, (brother by the whole blood) would be the heir to E, in preference to his half-brother, were it a disputed succession to divided property (539). The reason given for the preference is, that he (the full-brother) offers more sacrifices, and benefits more the manes of the dead of his family; in their eyes a real substantial ground of preference. In nature also, he is nearer, and, therefore, satisfies the description nearest of kin (541) (Lord Chelmsford.) NEELKISTO DEB BURMONO v. BEERCHUNDER THAKOOR.

———Full brother—Preference of, to half brother in Dayabhaga joint family—Reason for.

In a joint family governed by the Daya-bhaga law a brother of the whole blood succeeds in preference to a brother of the half-blood to the share of a deceased brother.

The brother of the whole blood stands with regard to religious offices in a higher position than the brother of the half-blood. The brother of the whole blood offers three oblations to the ancestors of the deceased on the father's side, and three on the mother's; whereas the brother of the half-blood offers three to the paternal ancestors only. Therefore, there are reasons peculiar to the Hindu Law of Succession, as expounded by the Dayabhaga, which may have led to distinction in the mode in which the succession to brothers takes place (152). That word and its synonym employed by Vijnaneswara in connection with other relatives, such as brother, uncle or grand-uncle, must be understood in a generic sense as in the case of the deceased owner, and the descendants in each ascending line, up to the fixed limit, should be exhausted at any rate to the third degree before making the ascent to the line next in order of succession (227).

If his intention had been to confine the descent in the case of collaterals to the actual sons of brothers and uncles, he would have employed terms which would have exactly conveyed his meaning, such as atmaja or auras, which mean "son of one's loins" (220). The right of collaterals to succeed to the inheritance of a deceased person is based on the rule of Manu, which has been translated differently by different writers, but which in substance amounts to this, that the estate of a deceased goes to his nearest Sapinda. The right of collaterals, therefore, is dependent on the existence of the sapinda-relationship between the propositus and the claimant (217). (Mr. Ameer Ali.) BUDDHA SINGH v. LALTU SINGH.

It has been contended that though this was ancestral property—descendible property—yet it would descend only to the direct descendants of the original donee. Their Lordships are of opinion that it being proved not to be originally for life only, but to be an hereditary property, and having apparently descended in the ordinary way of Hindu property, first to the sons, and then from the son to the mother, it lies on those who say it is confined to direct descendants, and that no one can claim it but the direct descendants of the original donee, to prove their case and show that by some custom that was the proper construction. In the absence of that, the property must be held to be one which went in the ordinary way of Hindu property. RAJAH MAHENDRA SINGH v. JOKHA SINGH.

It was argued that evidence of a custom regulating the succession to impartible estates, such as rajhes, where the rule of gaddinashin prevailed, was altogether inadmissible on a question as to the custom of succession to a partible estate governed by the ordinary Hindu law.

Held, that there was nothing in the mere fact of partibility to make evidence of a family custom excluding or postponing daughters to collaterals in impartible estates necessarily inapplicable to partible estates. (Lord Collins.) PARBATI KUNWAR v. CHANDAR PAL KUNWAR.

In a case in which the question was whether the plaintiff was, as a female, excluded from inheriting the real property of her grandson by the custom of the family and tribe of the parties, the defendants pleaded generally that no female whatever could succeed, and adduced oral evidence to that effect. A wajib-ul-arz, which was put in, was, however, in these terms: "If the deceased have two or more wives, lawfully married, then the property left by the deceased would be divided among the number of wives in this way; that if there be one son from one wife, and two or more from the other, then the one son from the former would take one half, and the two or more from the latter would take the other half, subdividing it equally among themselves; but a wife having no male issue shall receive no share; she shall, however, receive maintenance from the sons of the other wives who have inherited a share. In our family the custom is to give no share to daughters. If none of the wives lawfully married to a deceased co-sharer have any issue, in such a case of course the childless widow shall have possession of the share of the deceased. If a widow being childless desire to adopt a son, she can adopt one of the nearest male members of her deceased husband's family. She shall not be competent to adopt her brother or brother's son. Women not lawfully married, and their issue, provided they bear good moral character, will be entitled to receive only food and clothing, but shall not receive a share."

Held that the wajib-ul-arz very much qualified the general statement of the witnesses that no female could succeed in the family; for it distinctly stated that under some circumstances wives and widows succeeded, although it did not distinctly state that grandmothers did (8-9). The first question is as to the existence of a custom in the Nad Gowdki family by which, on descent, where there was more than one son, it is alleged, that the younger brothers did not, according to the ordinary Hindu Law, share with the eldest son in a division of the property, but received maintenance, or an allotment of property in lieu of maintenance, in place of sharing in the whole property.

———Evidence as to—Treatment of alleged lunatic by his own family—Value of.

A very important matter in considering the state of mind of a person alleged to be insane is the manner in which he was treated by his own family. In the present case, none of the family of J, who is alleged to have been insane at the time when the succession opened and to be therefore excluded from inheritance, prior to the application for a certificate of insanity, long after the right to the succession had attached, ever treated him as insane. The priests allowed him to perform all the religious duties. He performed the oblations to his father, which, according to the religion of the Hindus, would have no beneficial effect, and ought not to have been performed by him if he had been in a state of insanity. One of the principal reasons why, according to the Hindu law, insanity excludes from the right of inheritance is, that an insane person is incapable of performing religious duties, and because he is incapable of providing for the marriage of daughters, and other matters of that sort. But in this case the gentleman performed them all. His family never objected ; the priests never objected. He is stated to have been present at the marriage of his daughter. He himself was allowed to marry ; he was married three times to ladies whose father would in all probability have refused to allow their daughters to marry an insane man, and by one of them he had a son who was not insane. All these circumstances, with reference to the mode in which J was treated by his family, appear to their Lordships to have considerable weight and considerable importance in deciding the question of his sanity (178). The question was whether S, a Hindu was insane at the time of the death of her mother when the succession to her father opened, and was accordingly excluded from inheritance on that ground, or whether she became so only two months after the death of her mother.

Held, that the fact that immediately after the death of the mother, the sons of S, and not S, were held out to be, and were dealt with as, the heirs of the last male owner, confirmed, as the res gestoe of the case, the evidence in favour of the conclusion that S, was insane at the time of her mother's death (530-1).

If S had not been then insane, it seems almost improbable that some person would not have put forward her interest, or that third parties would have dealt with those as heirs, who really did not possess that character (531.) ———Evidence of — Medical evidence — Relations and family domestics—Non-production of—Inference from.

The question was whether S was, as alleged by the appellants, insane at the date of the death of her mother when the succession to her father opened, or whether, as alleged by the plaintiff-respondent, the husband of the lunatic, she became insane only two months after her mother died.

" The case of the respondents is open to the observation that if it is true, far better evidence of it might have been produced than has been produced by the respondents. For instance, if the woman became mad within two months of her mother's death, one would suppose that that madness must have been caused by some disorder which would require and receive medical treatment. We have, however, no medical evidence whatever. We have nothing to show, that having been sane up to a certain period, she became suddenly ill. Again, we have none of the near relations of the family produced. The mere fact that the husband verifies in the ordinary way the truth of the allegation in the plaint, is no answer to the suggestion that, if he had a true case, he, the nearest relation of this party, might have come forward and shown how the madness came on and all the circumstances relating to it. He, again, has within his power all her family and female domestics ; but there is not a single witness produced on that side, except the witnesses of the character so common in the Indian Courts, viz., male menial servants, dependants, and ryots living in the neighbourhood, who are all obviously persons less likely to have the circumstances deposed to within their knowledge, and to be far less trustworthy, than the members of the family who might have been produced " (527-8). ———Evidence of—Rumour and general belief in District as to insanity of person in question—Witness's statement of his own knowledge to fact of — Admissibility and value of—Witness conversant with district.

On an issue as to whether one S, who was insane, first became so before or after the death of her mother, a witness spoke of his own knowledge to the fact, that at a particuiar period the insanity of S was rumoured and generally believed in the District with which he was conversant. Objection was taken to the admissibility of that evidence on the ground that it was hearsay.

Held, that the evidence could not properly be described as mere hearsay (529).

Quaere, whether that testimony, if objected to, would have been receivable on the trial of such an issue in an English Court of Justice (529)

As regards the effect to be legitimately given to that testimony, their Lordships observed as follows :—If we had to deal here with the broad question of sanity or insanity—whether S were now sane or insane,—the witness's evidence would be of little or no value. But when it is an admitted fact that the woman is insane, and the question is, whether she first became so before or after the death of her mother, the testimony of a trustworthy witness, that long before that period she was, to his knowledge, reputed insane, is an important corroboration of the direct testimony given in the cause to the fact of her insanity at that time (530). ———Evidence of, given in suit raising question as to—Rejection of, on ground of non-production of such evidence in inquiry under Lunacy District Courts Act XXXV of 1858—Propriety.

The appeal arose out of an action in ejectment. The title upon which the plaintiff-respondent sued was based upon the fact that his wife, as the daughter of M, the last surviving widow of one T, became on the death of her mother entitled to the property as the next heir of her father, T ; and the principal issue raised in the cause was, whether that lady had not lost her right to inherit, by reason of her lunacy. The sole question was whether the lady was or was not insane at the time of her mother's death or whether, as alleged by the plaintiff, she became insane within two months after that event.

Within two months after the death of M, the plaintiff applied to the Zillah Judge, under Act XXXV of 1858 to be appointed Committee of his wife, alleging her lunacy. The Judge delegated the inquiry to a Munsiff. The defendants-appellants, who claimed title to the suit property under an ikrarnamah executed by the lunatic's sons and M, appeared as objectors on that proceeding. They appeared before the Munsif, but did not attend throughout the inquiry, and failed to produce witnesses to prove that the lady had been a lunatic from the time at which they alleged she became so, or at any time before the death of M. The Munsiff took evidence on the part of the plaintiff-respondent, and came to the conclusion, that the lady was of unsound mind. In his report the Munsif stated that the evidence adduced before him established that the lady became a lunatic only after the death of her mother. That report having been made to the Judge, the appellants again objected before the Judge, but he held that he had no jurisdiction to decide the question between the parties; that the simple issue was whether the lady was a person possessed of any property; and if so, whether she was sane or insane and required the protection of a Committee; and accordingly he appointed the Husband Committee.

In the suit out of which the appeal before their Lordships arose, the High Court thought the evidence before them being conflicting, the scale was turned in the plaintiff's favour by the Munsif's report, and decreed the suit.

Held, that if the High Court meant to say that the conduct of the appellants, as evidenced by the proceeding under Act XXXV of 1858, had been such as to lead to an inference that the case they afterwards made was untrue, they gave an effect to their conduct which it did not fairly bear. (526).

All that appears is, that the appellants went unnecessarily before a Tribunal which could not have decided the question between them and the opposite party, and that being there they failed to produce their evidence. Their Lordships are of opinion that it is neither a necessary nor a legitimate inference from that fact that the evidence which the appellants have produced in this suit ought not to be believed (526-7). ———Exclusion on ground of—Admission in plaint of—What amounts to.

The action out of which the appeals arose was brought by J, who was the eldest son, and B who was the third son of P, against the appellant, for the recovery of an estate in Oudh of which he had held possession. They were the nearest relatives entitled to succeed, but for D, who was the second son of P. D, though alive, was not made a party to the suit, and he never claimed the estate. The estate being descendible as an impartible estate, J and B could not take jointly, and J alone was the proper heir if he was not excluded from inheritance in consequence of insanity.

In the plaint J was described as insane, and he sued through his wife as his guardian. But the plaint, nevertheless, claimed that the estate had descended to him, and it went on to state that "the plaintiffs" (that is J and B who joined in the plaint) "are sapindas, ... , and under the ordinary rules of the Hindu law the plaintiffs are the nearest male heirs and collaterals".

Held that, although J might be incompetent to commence the suit, or to proceed therein except by a guardian, the plaint was no evidence, nor did it lead to any inference that he was not the heir-at-law, and that he was excluded from inheritance on the ground of insanity (175).

Inheritance—Exclusion from—(Contd.)

J could not have been an heir, as was claimed in the plaint; if he was excluded from inheritance. The plaint shews that J was considered competent to inherit, and that he was not excluded by reason of insanity at the time when the succession opened, although he might have been insane at the time of the filing of the plaint (176). Sir Barnes Peacock). ———Exclusion on ground of—Reason for.

One of the principal reasons why, according to the Hindu law, insanity excludes from the right of inheritance is, that an insane person is incapable of performing religious duties, and because he is incapable of providing for the marriage of daughters, and other matters of that sort (178). In a case in which the question was whether J was excluded from inheritance on the ground of insanity, the Judicial Commissioner held, reversing the Court below, that he was insane at the time when the succession opened, and that he was, therefore, excluded from the right of inheritance.

In a case in which the question was whether a person was excluded from inheritance on the ground of insanity, the Judicial Commissioner, who held that he was, attached very great importance to the will of his father, in which the father stated that he was insane.

Held that the mere statement by the father in his will that his son was insane was no evidence upon which the Court could properly act in determining the question as to the son's exclusion from the right of inheritance upon the ground of insanity (179). LEPROSY.

———Exclusion on ground of — Adoption—Capacity to take in—Disqualification as to—Condition.

The question was whether N, a Hindu, was so afflicted with leprosy as to deprive him of the position of being joint owner of certain family property, and secondly to deprive him of the ability to make a valid adoption of a son.

The Courts below concurrently found that N was not so crippled or disabled by bodily infirmity or deformity as to cease to be a useful member of society capable of holding and enjoying property. Their findings showed that although he was afflicted with a certain type of leprosy it was a type not very apparent except to minute inspection, and certainly a type which did not unfit him for performing both social and religious duties in company with others.

Held, affirming the Courts below, that the leprosy of N was not a disqualification.

Deformity and unfitness for social intercourse arising from the virulent and disgusting nature of the disease would appear to be what has been accepted in both the texts and the decisions as the most satisfactory test. Inheritance—Gentiles in the Mithakshara.

———Class of, in the Mithakshara—Constitution of—Conditions necessary for.

Family union or connection derived from a common head, the founder of the family, may reasonably be regarded, amongst a patriarchal people,as the source of the entire class from which a succession of heirs may be derived. Again, as males are preferred to females in succession, from religious reasons, this same class may be reasonably subject to the condition that the descent be generally derived from males, who, for the same reason, may obtain a constant preference. The text of the whole of the 5th and 6th sections of the 2nd Chapter of the Mithakshara is in the strictest conformity to these principles. The Gentiles, or Gotraja (from the Gotra), are described as descending from one common stock, a male, and derived generally through males, as forming a family, though embracing, possibly, many families, and such original bond of union is regarded as necessary to the constitution of the Gotra. These conditions are all that are stated as necessary to the constitution of the class of Gentiles (391). (Sir Robert Phillimore.) BHYAH RAM SINGH v. BHYAH UGUR SINGH.

In Yagnavalkya's rule relating to the succession to the estate of a person who dies without leaving any male issue, and referred to by Vijnaneswara as "the compact series of heirs," the paternal grand-mother is not included as an heir. Vijnaneswara finds a place for her among the gotraja, on the authority of an enunciation of Manu, which he quotes in Ch. ii, S. 1, V. 7, and which runs thus : "Of a son dying childless the mother shall take the estate ; and the mother also being dead, the father's mother shall take the heritage."

According to Manu, then, if his words are to be literally construed, the paternal grandmother would take immediately after the mother. This difficulty Vijnaneswara himself recognises ; in order to reconcile the conflict between Yagnavalkya, who omits the grandmother altogether from his "compact series of heirs", and Manu, who would place her directly after the mother, he places her somewhat arbitrarily aftet the "brother's sons". The question, however, whether he intended his declaration to be imperative can be solved only by a less free translation than Mr. Colebrooke's (219). ———Joint family property and separate property of—Devolution of—Courses of—Distinction.

According to the Hindu law, there need not be unity of heirship (609).

The proposition that there cannot be property belonging to a member of a united Hindu family, which descends in a course different from that of the descent of a share of the property held in union is new, unsupported by authority, and at variance with principle. That two courses of descent may obtain on a part division of joint property is apparent from a passage in W. H. Macnaghten's "Hindu Law", title "Partition," Vol. I, p. 53 (608-9).

Again, it is not pretended that on the death of the acquirer of separate property, the separately acquired property falls into the common stock, and passes like ancestral property. On the contrary, it is admitted that if the acquirer leaves male issue, it will descend as separate property to that issue down to the third generation. Although, therefore, where there is male issue, the family property and the separate property could not descend to different persons, they would descend in a different way, and with different consequences; the sons taking their father's share in the ancestral property subject to all the rights of the co-parceners in that property, and his self-acquired property free from those rights. The course of succession would not be the same for the family and the separate estate; and it is clear, therefore, that, according to the Hindu law, there need not be unity of heirship (609). ———According to the rule laid down by Sir William Macnaghten: "If at a general partition any part of the property is left joint, the widow of a deceased brother will not participate, notwithstanding the separation, but such undivided residue will go exclusively to the brother." That authority was one of those upon which this Board in the Shivagunga case decided the converse of the proposition, viz., that though a family might be undivided, the separate property of any member would nevertheless go according to the law of succession to separate estate. It in fact goes to support the proposition that, whether the general status of the family be joint or divided, property which is joint will follow one, and property which is separate will follow another, course of succession (271). In a suit brought by K, the plaintiff in the suit, for the recovery of a Zemindary of which the last male owner was one Raja Ajeet Singh, the question was whether the descent in the family was to be regulated by the Dayabhaga or the Mithakshara law.

K himself claimed under a deed of gift executed by S, the widow of Raja Ajeet Singh, and it appeared that in a long litigation in which S was engaged with M, the defendant in the suit out of which the appeal before their Lordships arose, it was, without any objection on the part of S, allowed by her vakils, and assumed and held by the Court that the descent of the suit Zemindary was regulated by the Sastras in use in Bengal, that the whole proceeding was conducted on that footing, and that the decision in favour of S was founded expressly on that ground. If further appeared that, after the death of S, K himself alleged that the suit between M and S had been decided in her favour agreeably to the Sastras and the customs of the family; and in the suit out of which the appeal arose itself it was shown that decisions affecting lands in the locality in which the suit Zemindary was situated were founded on the Sastras in use in Bengal.

Held, affirming the Court below, that the evidence was quite sufficient to support the conclusion that the Dayabhaga and not the Mithakshara, Sastras, ought to be applied to the

The question was whether succession to the estate of a deceased Hindu was governed by the Dayabhaga law or the Mithakshara law. The contest was between the widow of the deceased and the representatives of his first cousin. The deceased and his cousin were members of a joint Hindu family. The widow contended that the Dayabhaga law, the law of the place where the property was situate and the parties had been long resident, was applicable to the case. The representatives of the cousin contended that the Mithakshara law, the law governing the family before it came to and settled in Bengal, was applicable.

Held that, on such a question, the fact that the cousin performed the Sraddh of the deceased, unexplained, bore strongly on the queston of the right to the succession being under the Mithakshara (97). ———Deceased—Personal law of.

According to the law administered by the Provincial Courts of British India, on the death of any owner, being absolute owner, any question touching the inheritance from him of his property is determinable in a manner personal to the last owner. This system is made the rule for Hindus and Mahomedans by positive regulation; in other cases it rests upon the course of judicial decisions (525). ———English rules or authorities—Inapplicability of.

In a case in which questions arose touching the right of succession to valuable property of a Hindu inhabitant of Calcutta, held, that the questions must be dealt with and decided according to the Hindu law prevailing in Bengal, to which alone the property in question was subject, and that little or no assistance could be derived from English rules or authorities touching the transfer of property or the right of inheritance or succession thereto (64).

Various complicated rules which have been established in England are wholly inapplicable to the Hindu system, in which property, whether moveable or immoveable, is, in general, subject to the same rule of gift or will, and to the same course of inheritance (64). Two grandsons, who were first cousins, formed a joint undivided Hindu family, joint in food, worship, and estate, and during their joint lives they resided continually together. One of them predeceased the other, leaving the plaintiff his childless widow. In a suit brought by her against the representatives of the survivor for the recovery of the moiety of the family properties which belonged to her husband, held, that the property being situate wholly in Bengal, and the family having been long resident there, the plaintiff was certainly entitled to rely on her prima facie title, as heiress under the general Hindu law as administered in that part of India, and that it was incumbent on the defendants to allege and prove a title displacing her prima facie title (90-1).

The prevalence in any part of India of a special course of descent in a family, differing from the ordinary course of descent in that place of the property of people of that class or race, stands on the footing of usage or custom of the family. Two brothers, K and N, subject to the Dayabaga school of the Hindu law, executed a document, by which they purported to provide for the permament devolution of their respective properties in the direct male line, including adopted sons, with the condition that in case of failure of lineal male heirs in one branch the properties belonging to that branch should go to the other, subject to the same rule; and only in the absence of male descendants in the direct line in either branch were the properties to go to female heirs or other descendants. The document was called a will, but the preamble stated the object for which it was executed. The preamble said, "whereas body is mortal, it is impossible to say what may befall at what time, and as ruin may ensue from disputes relating to the shares arising in future amongst son, daughter, daughter's son and child less widow, unless some rules are regularly framed, and it has accordingly become necessary to prescribe a set of rules in that behalf, and hence the rules mentioned below are laid down; these shall become operative and come into force on our death."

K died, leaving him surviving, besides a son named A, and a daughter D, his brother N, and their mother. A died without any issue and the mother of K and N subsequently. The plaintiffs, the sons of D, instituted the suit, out of which the appeal arose, against N, claiming as next reversioners to A, their maternal uncle, the properties which originally belonged to K, and after him to A, and which had since come into the possession of N.

Held, reversing the High Court, that by the instrument in question it was clearly intended to vary the rule of Hindu law, and to control the devolution of the properties until the indefinite failure at some remote period of the male line of both brothers, that such an attempt to alter the mode of succession prescribed by law is illegal, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the suit properties (1124-5).

There is no need for the contention that under the instrument in question there was a device in favour of A, with a gift over to N, the uncle. Their Lordships have no doubt that the sole intention of the executants in this document, as they expressly avowed in the preamble, was to alter the rule of succession in their family which they had no power to do. A private individual, who attempts by gift or will to make property inheritable " otherwise than the law directs, is assuming to legislate, and the gift must fail, and the inheritance take place as the law directs (119-20).

A and B, two brothers, subject to the Dayabhaga school of the Hindu law, executed a document by which they purported to provide for the permanent devolution of their respective properties in the direct male line, including adopted sons, with the condition that in case of failure of lineal male heirs in one branch the properties belonging to that branch should go to the other, subject to the same rule; and only in the absence of male descendants in the direct line in either branch were the properties to go to female heirs or their descendants. In a suit instituted by the daughter's sons of A, claiming as next reversioners of C, A's son, who died without any issue, to recover from B the properties which originally belonged to A and after him to C, and which had since come into the possession of B, held, that the intention of the executants was to vary the rule of Hindu law, and to control the devolution of the properties until the indefinite failure at some remote period of the male line of both brothers; that such an attempt to alter the mode of succession prescribed by law was illegal; and that the plaintiffs were therefore entitled to recover the suit properties (119).

Throughout the instrument there is no indication of an intention to make a gift to any person; whilst paragraph 4 clearly shows that the "sons and grandsons," who took the properties left by the executants acquired them as "full owners." There was no restriction on their powers to deal with such properties "in any way they wished." But, although they acquired the estate as absolute owners, it was not to descend in the legal channel according to the prescriptions of the Hindu law, but in accordance with the rules framed by the executants with the avowed object stated in the preamble. It was only on the indefinite failure of male issue in both branches that the female heirs or their descendants were to receive the shares prescribed for them in the Shastras. This is the general policy of the instrument (119). (Mr. Ameer Ali.) PURNA SASHI BHATTACHARJI v. KALIDHAN RAI CHOWDHURI. (1911) 38 I. A. 112 = 38 C. 603 (619-20) = 15 C. W. N. 693 = 8 A. L. The text of the Mithakshara, Ch. ———Ch. II, S. 1—Inapplicability of, to separate property of co-parcener.

The very terms of the text of the Mithakshara, Ch. II, S. 1, referring to the right of widows to inherit in default of male issue, refer to cases in which the whole estate of the deceased has been his separate property, and, indeed, the whole chapter in which the text is contained, seems to deal only with cases in which the property in question has been either wholly the common property of a united family, or wholly the separate property of the deceased husband. We find no trace in it of a case in which the property in question may have been in part the common property of a united family, and in part the separate acquisition of the deceased; and it cannot, we think, be assumed that because widows take the whole estates of their husbands when they have been separated from, and not subsequently re-united with, their co-heirs, and have died leaving no male issue, they cannot, when their husbands have not been so separated, take any part of their estates, although it may have been their husband's separate acquisition. The text, therefore, does not seem to govern such a case (607-8). (Lord Justice Turner.) KATAMA NATCHIAR v. THE RAJAH OF SHIVAGUNGA. (1863) 9 M. I. A. 539 = 2 W. R. (P. The Mithakshara, whilst holding that the right to inherit does not spring from the right to offer oblations, does not exclude it from consideration as a test of propinquity or nearness of blood (217). It is absolutely clear that under the Mithakshara, whilst the right of inheritance arises from sapinda-relationship, or community of blood, in judging of the nearness of blood-relationship or propinquity among the gotraja, the test to be applied to discover the preferential heir is the capacity to offer oblations. This rule has been affirmed by this Board in the following words :—"When a question of preference arises, as preference is founded on superior efficacy of oblations, that principle must be applied to the solution of the difficulty" (227-8). In families governed by the law of the Mithakshara the right of succession amongst the three classes of bandhus mentioned in chapter II, S. 6 of the Mithakshara is governed by the propinquity of the class ; accordingly a pitri bandhu does not succeed until the classes of atma bandhus and pitri bandhus are exhausted. The rule of the Mithakshara, in preferring the nearer to the remote class of bandhus, is not dependent on the individual propinquity or the efficacy of offerings to a deceased person (94-5). ———Inheritance under—Preferential right of—Test—Spiritual benefit.

The question of preference is distinct from that of entire exclusion. When a question of preference arises, as preference is founded on superior efficacy of oblations, that principle must be applied to the solution of the difficulty. It obtains properly when a succession opens to a deceased, when the question mooted is a real one (at least in the contemplation of pious Hindus), viz., who best can confer on the deceased and his ancesters not fully benefited, the benefits which the grades of oblations offer in differing degrees. Where no sexual or personal incapacity exists, no ground of entire exclusion from inheritance exists if the opposing parties confer inferior benefits, or benefits in equal degrees only. In such a case, what reason could justify a sentence of exclusion from inheritance on a claim to put a limitation on language which declares the whole class heritable, and not simply some persons found in it ? ———Scheme of—Dr. Sarvadhikari's construction of—Correctness of.

Dr. Rajkumar Sarvadhikari's construction appears to their Lordships to rest on a logical foundation, and his views seem to be consistent and clear. In effect he says that the Mithakshara propounds a definite scheme of succession, lineal male descendants of the deceased owner down to and including the third degree, who constitute the first class of propinquous relations (the nearest sapindas), inherit in succession in the first instance. In their default the widow and daughter take by express provision of the law. The daughter's son comes in summarily. In their absence the inheritance ascends ; each ascending line begins with a female, and each has to be exhausted in accordance with the rule of propinquous sapinda-relationship before the next in order can take; so that the parents and "their three successive descendants" take first ; then the paternal grandmother and the paternal grandfather, and "their three successive descendants" come next, and so on (224). ———Devolution of—Two courses of, under Mithakshara law—Illustrations of.

The Mithakshara law recognises two courses of devolution in the case of what is called "obstructed inheritance"—the ancestral property descending in one channel, the self-acquired property in another. Even where the estate is impartible, this distinction in the course of descent is recognized (281).

Unless there be a custom by which self-acquired properties in a Mithakshara family become part of the ancestral estate, or unless it be shown that the person acquiring the same intended to incorporate such acquisitions with the estate, they decend by the ordinary law of inheritance. For example, where the owner of an ancestral impartible estate, possessed also of self-acquired properties, dies leaving lineal male descendants, as the inheritance is "unobstructed," both classes of property go to them; supposing, however, he were to die leaving no male progeny in the direct line, but a widow and a divided agnatic relation, in the absence of a custom the self-acquired property would go to the widow, whilst the estate would devolve on the agnatic heir. The onus of establishing a custom dehors the ordinary rule in such a case would lie on the person asserting it (281-2). (Mr. Ameer Ali.) MURTAZA HUSAIN KHAN v. MAHOMED YASIN ALI. (1916) 43 I. Under the Mithakshara law, a great-great-great-grandson of a common ancestor is not excluded from inheriting as a gentile to another great-great-great-grandson on the ground that he is too remote in descent from the common ancestor.

So held, affirming the decision of the court below, in a case in which the defendants were in possession under alleged alienations by the widow of the last male owner.

The plaintiffs show a common ancestor, a Gotra, a community of family, a descent which extended to the deceased and themselves, and satisfy every condition of the text (391-2).

The court below supported its opinion by the authority of the decision of the Privy Council in 2 M. I. A. 133. The judgment in that case concludes, that the Bandhus do not inherit, "till those on the father's side to the seventh degree have been exhausted." As the judgment is founded in a great degree on the opinion of Mr. Harrington, and expresses no dissent from his method, of arriving at the seventh person by taking six degrees in the descending or ascending line, the court below was justified in treating this point as settled by authority, and the plaintiffs as gentiles within the degrees, and so entitled to inherit (393-4). The word "putra" and its synonym employed by Vijnaneswara in connection with brothers and uncles must be understood in a generic sense as in the case of the deceased owner, and the descendants in each ascending line, up to the fixed limit, should be exhausted at any rate to the third degree before making the ascent to the line next in order of succession (227).

Further, the great-grandson of the grandfather of the deceased admittedly confers greater benefit on the deceased by the offerings he makes to the manes of the common ancestor, and is, therefore, under the Mithakshara, the preferential heir (227-8).(Mr. Ameer Ali.) BUDDHA SINGH v. LALTU SINGH. (1915) 42 I. The maternal uncle and the deceased were sapindas of each other; and he (the maternal uncle) is undoubtedly nearer in degree to the deceased than the son of the paternal aunt's son. The maternal uncle also offers oblations to his father and grandfather to whom the deceased was also bound to offer pinda. Under the Mithakshara law a paternal uncle of the half-blood is entitled to inherit in preference to the son of a paternal uncle of the whole blood (183 4).

It is conceded that the author of the Mithakshara has expressly declared that brothers of the half-blood come before nephews of the whole blood, and in principle their Lordships see no reason to differentiate between the brothers of the propositus and the brothers of his father. Having regard to the general scheme of the Mithakshara, they think that the preference of the whole blood to the half-blood is confined to members of the same, or, to "sapindas of the same degrees of descent from the common ancestor" (184). The custom of primogeniture is stated in two ways, first as a custom of a District so as to bring it within the Regulation X of 1800; that is to say, it is the custom of a district supposed to be a Jungle mehal, in Zillah B. Now, of the existence in any known district whatever of anything which can he predicated as a Jungle mehal in which this Zemindary is situated there is neither pleading nor evidence. There is nothing at all to show any custom, except a Collector's letter with respect to a custom extending to all the Zemindaries, throughout the whole Zillah B; and certainly it would be very strong indeed to hold, merely upon that evidence, that there was a custom proved extending to the whole of the Zillah of B, or to the whole of any undefined district within that Zillah (548-9). were excluded from inheritance, and that the male relative who was in the eldest line of male descent from the last holder or his father or grand father succeeded, the appellate Court concurred with the District Judge in holding that the evidence established that the custom found by the District Judge to be an existing operative custom was at some time or other before the settlement of 1865 existing as an operative binding custom. They differed from him, however, in holding that the custom, though once existing and operative, had ceased to be so, because it had been destroyed by the acceptance by the then head of the family at the Permanent Settlement in 1865 of a sanad from the Government of India containing clauses inconsistent with the custom.

The other custom alleged is a family custom of this particular family. Of that family custom there really is no sufficient allegation, if there be any allegation at all. Even if there be anything which is sufficient to raise the plea of family custom, there is no satisfactory evidence to prove that custom. There is some trace in the letter of a Collector of a sort of general custom extending through the whole Zillah in which the suit Zemindary is situated, all the zemindaries being held by the kind of title alleged, but the genealogical tree, which is the only thing contrary which is in evidence, is certainly insufficient to found a family custom, which the Court below have held must be proved by something like what we should call in this country immemorial usage. ———The question was whether the succession to the suit estate was governed by a family custom of succession by lineal primogeniture, or by the ordinary Hindu law.

The family was a Brahmin family long established in Cuttack, members of which were proved to nave held the office of Chowdhuri, under both the Mogul and the Mahratta rule. The documents in the case showed that the office of Chowdhuri (chief) was held for many generations by a member of the family and that, to the holder of that office, certain lands were assessed as a part of his remuneration and that the grant was of an office only and to an individual to be held during good behaviour and revocable at the pleasure of the sovereign by whom it might be conferred, not merely on the eldest son, but on anybody. The evidence was further to the effect that, whenever the holder of the estate died leaving more than one son, the right of the eldest son was challenged in the Courts, and the litigation invariably ended in a compromise under which the younger sons obtained a share of the estate very much in excess of the maintenance to which, had the custom existed, they would have been entitled.

Succession by primogeniture is the rare exception to the ordinary rule in Hindu families taking place only upon the descent of some impartible subject, as a raj or office, and in most cases of the kind some local or family usage regulating such descent will be found (6).

The inheritance of Hindus which descend on a single heir are almost entirely confined to Zemindaries, in the nature of a raj, and to offices and semble it is obviously in accordance with reason and convenience that such successions should devolve upon the son, who would, in natural course, first reach manhood, and be capable of discharging the duties attaching to inheritances of the kind (9). The learned Judges below have inferred, in the absence of any indication to the contrary, that the above-mentioned definitions were intended by the authors of the Mithakshara and the Mayukha to apply wherever in those books sapindaship was treated of, and consequently where it was treated of in relation to the right to inherit (233). That the mention in the Mithakshara of certain members of the family as gotraja-sapindas is not exhaustive, and that others than those expressly mentioned may be included in the class, may be inferred from the following passage in pl. 3 of C. 2, S. 5 of the Mithakshara :—" On failure of the paternal grandmother, gotraja-sapindas, namely, "grandfather and the rest, inherit the estate." It would seem, also, though the grandmother and great-grandmother are also expressly mentioned, that the wives of the remoter ancestors in the direct ascending line up to the seventh degree would likewise succeed to their descendants as sapindas. The reasons for the decision of this Board that the enumeration of bandhus contained in the Mithakshara is not exhaustive are applicable to the enumeration of the sapindas (236). (*Sir Montague E. FIRST-BORN SON.

———Preference of—Divisible and indivisible inheritances—Applicability to.

One great rule of religion binding upon every Hindu is the duty of having a son, not only for the sake of the spiritual benefits he obtains for himself by his birth, but because he thereby discharges the pious debt he owes to his ancestors. And, as a consequence naturally flowing from this law, the first-born son is, throughout the books of authority, treated as pre-eminent amongst his brothers, and held to be entitled to many special privileges.

It will be found, from numerous authorities and instances, that, although the father's property, by the general rule, descends upon all his sons, yet, whenever it becomes necessary to make a distinction, precedence is given to the first-born.

Thus Manu, after laying down the cardinal rule of succession that brothers divide the paternal property among them, adds, " the eldest brother may take entire possession of the patrimony ; and the others may live under him as they lived under their father. unless they choose to be separated."

" By the eldest, at the moment of his birth, the father having begotten a son, discharges a debt to his own progenitors. The eldest son, therefore, ought, before partition, to manage the whole patrimony."

FIRST-BORN SON—(Contd.)

" That son alone, by whose birth alone he discharges his debt, and through whom he attains immortality, was begotten from a sense of duty.

The general doctrines above alluded to are also found in other old authorities, and are treated as part of the foundation of the Hindu law of succession by modern writers and compilers (6-7).

The doctrines above referred to, though occurring in passages treating of divisible inheritances, apply also to the case of an inheritance which is from its nature indivisible, and can therefore go to one only of several sons. In that case also, the first-born son, by reason of his general pre-eminence, should be preferred to his younger brother (7). (Sir Montague E. Smith.) RAMALAKSHMI AMMAL v. SIVANANTHA PERUMAL SETHURAYAR.

———Preference of—Mothers different of same caste and class—Sons of—Applicability to case of

It was not disputed that in the case of several sons by the same mother, the first-born would be preferred to his younger brothers in the case of an inheritance which is from its nature indivisible; but it was contended that where there were sons by different wives the priority of marriage and not of birth was to be regarded. No authority whatever was cited to support this contention, certainly none as regards the sons by any wives after the first. On the contrary, there is a good deal of authority pointing to the conclusion that there is no distinction, except seniority of brith, amongst the sons of wives of the same caste and class.

Thus Manu says, " a younger son being born of a first marriage after an elder son had been born of a wife last married but of a lower class, it may be a doubt in that case how the division shall be made."

The doubt thus suggested whether, even in the case of a wife of a lower class, there would be inequality of division amongst the sons, raises a strong presumption that there would be none where the mothers were of the same class. But the matter does not rest on presumption, for S. 125 runs thus :—

" As between sons born of wives equal in their class, and without any other distinction, there can be no seniority in right of the mother ; but the seniority ordained by law is according to birth "

It is true the writer is in this section treating of partible successions, but he is at the same time proclaiming the privileges to which the eldest son is entitled, and one of them he had just declared in a preceding section (119) thus ;—

" Let them never divide the value of a single goat or sheep ; a single goat or sheep, remaining after an equal distribution, belongs to the first-born."

Now, when it is said that the single goat or sheep is to belong to one son, it is apparently for the same reason that a zemindary so descends, viz., that the subject is in its nature impartible, and, therefore, the rule that is laid down with reference to one impartible subject, viz., that "it belongs to the first-born," appears by reasonable and just implication to be the rule applicable to all such subjects. And which of several sons is to be deemed the first-born is declared by S. 125 above cited, " there can be no seniority in right of the mother, but the seniority ordained by law is according to birth" (7-8). Defendants 1 to 3, with their youngest brother, who was a minor and was not a party to the suit, constituted a joint Hindu family carrying on various businesses. The 1st defendant was the eldest brother and manager of the family business. He and the 2nd defendant started and carried on a brewery business, which was not a business of the joint family, borrowed money from the respondents for the purpose, and executed an agreement in their favour in respect of the amount so borrowed.

In a suit brought on the basis of the said agreement, it appeared that the 3rd defendant, who had not signed the agreement and had not been consulted about it, had, however, accepted it as binding upon him, and derived benefits under it and consequently accepted it, with liability to perform it.

Held, that the agreement could not be regarded as a contract of the joint family, and that the minor brother, when he came of age, could repudiate it, so far as he and his interest in the joint family property were concerned, and that his interests in the joint family property could not be affected by the suit ; but that the agreement was binding on defendants 1 and 2,who were parties to it, and on 3rd defendant, who had accepted it as a contract ; and that they could not escape their liability to perform it or to pay damages for the non-performance of it by showing that they had no property except that which was property of the joint family in which their minor brother was equally interested with them. ———Family business or individual business of member himself—Evidence—Maintenance of member out of family funds up to starting of business—Effect.

The question of whether a man who, happening to be a member of a joint Hindu family, carried on his business, whatever it was, personally for his own benefit without detriment to the joint family fund, or carried on such business as a member of the joint family, is a question of fact to be determined on the evidence. No inferences can be drawn from the fact that until he began to so carry on his business he was maintained by the joint family funds. As a member of the joint family he was entitled to be maintained at the expense of the joint family, and to receive an ordinary education suitable to a person of his position, as was any other member of the family (53). D, who had a nucleus of joint family property the income of which was nearly half a lakh, carried on for some years a business of extracting and selling mica. The question was whether the profits of that business and the properties purchased with them ought to be held to be the self-acquired properties of D.

It appeared in one instance at least that the land from which the mica was extracted was ancestral family property. It appeared also that the moneys paid for wages and other expenses of winning the mica were supplied out of the general income of D, and that the profits were devoted to the general maintenance of the family and the education of his son.

Held that, from whatever source some of the lands from which the mica was gotten might have been acquired, the mica business was dealt with as part of the joint family property, and that the profits thereof and the properties purchased with such profits were joint family property (746). The thing called co-parcenary in Hindu law is not identical with co-parcenary as understood in English law. Thus, in the ordinary case of the death of a member of a joint family under the Mithakshara law, his right accresces to the other members by survivorship, while, under the English law, if a co-parcener dies his or her right does not accresce to the other co-parceners, but goes to his or her own heirs (211). ———Members of family — Co-parcenaryship between, and survivorship following upon it—Self-acquisition of united member—No survivorship in.

According to the principles of Hindu law, there is co-parcenaryship between the different members of a united family, and survivorship following upon it. There is community of interest and unity of possession between all the members of the family, and upon the death of any one of them the others may well take by survivorship that in which they had during the deceased's lifetime a common interest and a common possession. But the law of partition shows that as to the separately-acquired property of one member of a united family, the other members of that family have neither community of interest nor unity of possession. The foundation, therefore, of a right to take such property by survivorship fails; and there are no grounds for postponing the widow's rights to any superior right of the co-parceners in the undivided property (611). S and K were two brothers owning a joint estate governed by the Mithakshara law. They entered into an agreement which provided as follows :—"As to the immoveable property belonging to us both, the said immovable property shall, in case of the failure of aurasa (self-begotten) male issue in either of these two lines, i.e., either for yourself or in your line of aurasa sons or in my line of aurasa sons, be put in possession of the other line, but it shall not be alienated by making adoption and the like."

At the date of the agreement S had a son G. The question was whether S, the father, could not by the agreement so bind the estate that an adopted son of his son G should not take by descent.

Held that the father of G could not bind his son, who was then in existence, not to adopt, or legally stipulate that if he should adopt, the son so adopted should not inherit (99).

Quære, whether the said agreement was or was not binding between the parties who made it (99). (Sir Barnes Peacock.) SRI RAJA RAO VENKATA MAHAPATI SURYA RAO BAHADUR v. THE HON. SRI RAJA RAO VENKATA MAHAPATI GANGADHARA RAMA RAO BAHADUR.

———Binding character of, against sons—Law as to—Debts incurred by father—Binding character of—Manager other than father—Rule in cases of.

On the question of the binding character of a debt incurred or an alienation of family property made by the father or other manager of a joint Hindu family as against the other members, their Lordships summed up the result of the authorities as follows :—

(1) The managing co-parcener of a joint undivided estate cannot alienate or burden the estate qua manager except for purposes of necessity.

(2) If he is the father and the reversioners are the sons he may, by incurring debt, so long as it is not for an immoral purpose, lay the estate open to be taken in execution proceeding upon a decree for payment of that debt.

(3) If he purports to burden the estate by mortgage, then unless that mortgage is to discharge an antecedent debt, it would not bind more than his own interest.

(4) Antecedent debt means antecedent in fact as well as in time, that is to say. that the debt must be truly independent and not part of the transaction impeached.

(5) There is no rule that this result is affected by the question whether the father, who contracted the debt or burdens the estate, is alive or dead. (Lord Dunedin.) RAJA BRIJ NARAIN RAI v. MANGALA PRASAD RAI.

The controversies and conflicting decisions on the father's powers of mortgage and sale, on the payment of his debts out of the inheritance, and on the testamentary power, will occur to everybody who is familiar with Indian litigations of the past half-century or so. ———Family arrangement effecting, or will—Test—Forfeiture for bad behaviour—Power of—Reservation in deed of—Scope and effect of.

The father and manager of a joint Hindu family governed by the Mithakshara law executed a document, called a will, which recited that, "my three sons are at present fully qualified to conduct the business. Therefore in order to avoid a dispute after my death I have at present, while in a sound state of body and mind, and of my own freewill and accord, divided the property among my sons, heirs, as follows. The document gave the details of the division, and provided that, "If I at any time come back from pilgrimages and find mismanagement or character of any one bad then I shall have power to cancel this will which shall be enforced from the date of its execution." The document concluded as follows :—" All the three sons were put in separate possession of the estate in the beginning of the fusli year. I have no other heir having a right besides those mentioned in this will. I have therefore executed this will in order that it may serve as evidence."

Held, that the document was not a "will," because it differed from a will in the crucial characteristic that it was intended to speak from the date at which it was written and not from a future date, viz., the death of the writer. The document was, in fact, and was intended to be viewed as a record of a family arrangement then and there made and carried into effect partitioning the family estate among those interested.

The provision in the document reserving power to the father to cancel the document in certain contingencies was not sufficient to prevent the partition operating in præsenti. The highest effect that could be given to the provision was that it evidenced a contractual condition which the sons accepted in order to obtain the partition which gave them immediate possession of the property, and the provision amounted at the most to the contractual acceptance of a power of forfeiture in case of bad behaviour which would not be sufficient to prevent the partition operating in præsenti. But the true interpretation of the provision is probably that it was merely put in as a threat in order to keep the sons in good behaviour, and that it could not have been enforced specifically, or even at all (35 A. at 352). ———Son's right to compel—Immoveable and moveable properties—Distinction.

The material texts of the Mithakshara are to be found in the 27th and following slokas of the first section of the first chapter. It was argued that, because in the third sloka of the above section it is said that the wealth of the father becomes the property of his sons, in right of their being his sons, and that "that is an inheritance not liable to obstruction," their rights in the family estate must be taken to be only inchoate and imperfect during their father's life, and in particular that they cannot, without his consent, have a partition even of immoveable ancestral property. There was some authority in favour of this proposition, notwithstanding the texts to the contrary which are to be found in the Mithakshara itself (see slokas 5, 7, 8, 11 of S. 5 of the first Chapter). But it seems to be now settled law in the Courts of the three Presidencies that a son can compel his father to make a partition of ancestral immoveable property. ———Release of interest in joint family property under erroneous impression that it was self-acquisition of his own father—Test—Deed—Construction—Deed of latter description—Effect of—No partition thereby—Binding nature of deed on party himself and on his son.

A Hindu, who, with his two sons M and P, formed a joint Hindu family, allotted a part of the family estate to P as a provision for his maintenance, and P thereupon lived separately from his father and brother. P did not know that his father and M had any property which was ancestral, and in which he had an interest. He did not know that the property which was allotted to him was part of the joint family estate. The father then made a will bequeathing the rest of the family property to M. After the father's death, that is in 1907, P executed a deed, called a deed of release. It was really more in the nature of a series of recitals or admissions that the whole of the property was the separately acquired property of the father, that the father had made a will by virtue of which M had become full owner of the property after his father's death; that the father had given certain property to P during his lifetime, and that P had been living separately from his father and M; that M had given P certain additional property in consequence of his poverty; and finally, the document stated that P and his heir had no interest in the moveable and immoveable property acquired by M or his father, and that M was the full owner of all the property except that which had been given to P. It was found that prior to the date of that deed there had been no partition of the joint family properties.

In a suit brought by P's sons, making, inter alia, P, a defendant, who, however, died pending the suit, held, that the deed of 1907 did not operate either as a separation of status or as a partition of joint family property; that the renunciation by P was not binding upon his sons, and that, even if it was binding upon P himself, his renunciation enured not solely to the benefit of M's branch but to all the surviving co-parceners.

The deed proceeded upon the basis that there was no joint family and no joint family property. The basis was that all the property, including that which was in P's possession had been separately acquired, and that all the property except that in possession of P belonged to M. There is no suggestion in any part of the deed that the parties were proceeding upnn the basis that there was a joint family of which they were members, or that they were taking part in a division of the joint family property (420). PROOF OF PROPERTY BEING.

———Son's suit to set aside father's sale of property.

In a suit to set aside a deed of sale made by the plaintiffs' father on the ground that the lands, the subject-matter of the sale, were, in the view of the Hindu law, ancestral, and that the sale was not necessary, and was for a fictitious consideration and in fraud of the rights of the plaintiff's father, as next heir and reversioner on the death of the widow of D, the deceased owner, the question was whether the lands, the subject-matter of the sale, were ancestral.

There was really no evidence that the lands in question came to D by descent at all. There was evidence that he acquired some lands in the district by purchase from the owners, and there was a probability that he acquired others by the abandonment of other persons, who might have been collateral, and in that way, might have become possessed of lands which, by the custom of the Punjab, would be regarded as ancestral. But there was no evidence whatever defining the boundaries of those portions of land respectively.

REVENUE SALE OF, AGAINST FATHER—PURCHASE BY GOVERNMENT AT.

———Grant of portion of property by Government to third parties—Alteration of, on ground of his consent to grant being secured by fraud—Father's right of—Right by birth in, of subsequently-born son.

Property which was originally ancestral property of the family of G, was sold for arrears of revenue and was purchased by the Government. After the Government thus became the absolute owners of the property, they granted it in equal shares to G and his co-sharers. G's son, who was born subsequent to the date of the said grant, alleged that, in consenting to the grant being made to two of those three co-sharers, G was imposed upon by the third of them.

Held that, supposing that G was so imposed upon, and that there was some right in him to procure an alteration of the grant, that was not such an interest as a son would by his birth acquire a share in (196).

Whatever the nature of the right might be, whether it could be enforced by a suit or by a representation to the Government, it does not come within the rule of the Mithakshara which gives a son, upon his birth, a share in the ancestral estate of his father (196). Property, which was the ancestral property of the family of G, became, by reason of the sale thereof for arrears of revenue and of its purchase at that sale by the Government, the absolute property of the Government. Thereupon, the Government resolved to make a grant thereof to G and three others, his co-sharers, in four equal shares. Two years afterwards, all the four sharers appeared and caused to be recorded what was called a village administration paper, in which it was stated that they were entitled to the property in the shares of five biswas each. The plaintiff, the son of G, was born only subsequently to the grant by the Government and to the date of the said village administration paper.

Held, that whatever right the plaintiff might have, under the Mithakshara law, governing the family to ancestral property, it could not be said that at the time of his birth there was any ancestral property of which he could acquire a share except the five biswas (196).

SON'S RIGHT BY BIRTH IN.

———Debt contracted by father before birth—Decree for, and attachment in execution also before birth—Sale of ancestral property, after birth, to pay off that debt and to get rid of execution—Right by birth if prevails against.

Before the birth of the plaintiff, his father, who was governed by the Mithila law, contracted a debt, neither illegal nor immoral, upon which a decree was obtained, and the right and share of the father in ancestral property was attached in execution of that decree. To pay off that debt and to get rid of the execution, the father executed a sale-deed, after the birth of the plaintiff, conveying ancestral property.

The plaintiff contended that, as he had been born by the time the sale-deed was executed, he acquired such an interest in the property as prevented it from being made liable for the debt which his father had contracted, and that he was therefore entitled to have the deed of sale set aside.

Held, that the plaintiff did not gain such an interest in the property by birth as prevented it from being liable to pay the debt which his father had contracted, and that he was not therefore entitled to set aside the deed of sale (330). V, together with his four sons, formed a joint Hindu family, governed by the Mithakshara law. V died, survived by his sons, and in 1881 the joint family was dissolved, and a division of the joint estate took place, leaving the great part of it in the hands and under the control of T, one of the sons of V, who was the manager of the family. In 1886, a suit was brought by A, the son of L, another of the sons of V, against T, for the purpose of ascertaining the extent of the family assets remaining in his hands, for the necessary accounts, partition, and other relief, and to that suit all the members of the family, including R, one of the sons of V, and G, the then only son of R, were parties. Two decrees were made in that suit, one on 21st October, 1896, and the other on 17th August, 1897, and by them T was declared as liable to pay to R and his branch of the family certain sums of rupees.

On 21st November, 1897, a compromise was entered into between R, purporting to act both for himself and as guardian of his minor son G, and T. It consisted in releasing T from all liability to make the payments directed by the decrees aforesaid to be made, payments which were on the face of them considerable in extent ; and the only consideration mentioned was that T would agree not to prosecute an appeal which he then had on foot against those decrees.

G attained his majority in 1906 and instituted a suit against T and R seeking to recover the monies mentioned in the decrees of October 1896 and August 1897 as "the undivided son" of R. That suit went upon appeal to the Privy Council, and it was held by the Privy Council that the compromise of November, 1897, did not bind, and could not bind, the infant G, who ought to be remitted to his original rights under the decrees of October, 1896 and August, 1897, and the case was remitted to deal with the remaining issues on that footing. Two further sons were born to R before the case came on for hearing on remand, and they were added as defendants after the remand.

At the hearing on remand, the High Court regarded the order of the Privy Council as rendering the compromise binding on R's then existing share and held G and the after-born sons to be entitled only to the remaining half-share.

Held, that the view of the High Court was wrong, that, in fact, the order of the Privy Council only declared the compromise was not binding on G, who was remitted to all his original rights under the compromised suits, and that in the events that happened that entitled the whole family to share in the whole fund (97-8).

The agreement of November, 1897, did not purport to be a release of individual rights or shares in the fund at all ; it did not purport to effect any division of the joint family estate that then existed between R and his son G in the subject-matter of those decrees. On the contrary, what it purported to do was to release the whole of the debts that were then owing to the joint family in consideration of T, not prosecuting his appeals (98).

Now it has been held by this Board that that attempted arrangement failed so far as the infant was concerned ; and, if it failed so far as the infant was concerned, their Lordships think that in the events that have happened it must also be regarded as failing wholly to convey any of the joint estate at all ; and that for the following reasons : R, unless he was attempting to divide the joint family, could only deal with this property with the consent of his son or in his capacity as manager of the estate. In his capacity as manager of the estate he was only able to deal with it for certain limited purposes, and none of those purposes are, or can be, suggested as the consideration why these considerable sums were released. It follows, therefore, that the attempt to alienate, or to release, from the estate those substantial portions of the joint family property failed, and that there was no efficacy given to the arrangement that was then contemplated (98).

Semble, if G had predeceased his father, and there had been no further members of the joint family, R might not have been in a position to dispute the arrangement (98-9). ———Necessity for, immediate payment of purchase-money for discharge of existing incumbrances—Contract in fact entered into not calculated to secure that end and likely to result in property being wiped off altogether—Validity against sons of.

In a case in which immediate payment of the purchase price was the prime necessity, a Hindu father and managing member of a joint Hindu family entered into a contract for the sale of joint family property, which contract bound him to sell at a fixed price property of apparently increasing value in circumstances which gave the purchasers the privilege of indefinitely postponing completion of the purchase and payment of the price, with the further privilege, if it so suited them, of repudiating the bargain altogether on the ground that a prior contract for the sale of the same property had been entered into by the father and that, so long as that contract subsisted, he could not make out a title. The existence of the earlier contract in the event showed that the subsequent contract was deprived of all value as a solvent of the family's financial difficulties at its date, and was converted into an arrangement not materially more beneficial than one by which the father, at the end of 3 years, became bound to hand over to the mortgagees (to pay whom the contract was entered into) for, in effect nothing, the entire equity of redemption in the mortgaged property.

Held, that such a transaction was entirely beyond the power of the father as karta of the joint family, and was not binding on his sons (151). (Lord Blanesburgh.) RAM CHARAN LONIA v. BHAGWAN DAS MAHESHRI.

———Specific performance of—Decree for, execution of sale-deed by Court pursuant to decree, and possession given to purchaser, who paid off mortgage on property—Setting aside of contract in son's suit for that purpose—Terms of.

In a case in which a Hindu father and the manager of a joint family entered into a contract for the sale of family property to discharge a mortgage subsisting on the property, a decree for specific performance of the contract was obtained against the father alone. A formal sale-deed was executed by the Court in favour of the purchaser, and he was, under an order of Court, placed in possession of the property. He subsequently paid off the mortgage on the property. Afterwards the undivided sons of the vendor sued for a decree that the contract to sell entered into by their father was beyond his power as karta of the joint family, and was not binding on the plaintiffs. They did not, however, impeach the mortgage. It was held that the contract was beyond the power of the father as the karta of the joint family and was not binding on the plaintiffs.

Held, that the contract should be set aside only upon terms; that the purchaser should have the full benefit of the mortgage paid off by him as a mortgage, that his possession of the property, although unwarranted as purchaser, should not—it having been taken under an order of the Court—be treated as that of a mortgagee in possession with all the burdens of such a possession; and that the mortgage should for that purpose be treated as a usufructuary mortgage—and the possession of the purchaser be treated as possession thereunder—with the result that during that possession he would be entitled to no interest, but on the other hand would not be accountable for profits (152). to affect or to dispose of the joint family property in respect of purposes denominated necessary purposes. The principle in regard to this is analogous to that of the power vested in the head of a religious endowment or mutt, or of the guardian of an infant. In all of the cases where it can be established that the estate itself that is under administration demanded, or the family interests jnstified, the expenditure, then those entitled to the estate are bound by the transaction. This is neither inconsistent with nor an exception to the fundamental rule of the Mithakshara. For where estate or family necessity exists, that necessity rests upon the co-parceners as a whole, and it is proper to imply a consent of all of them to that act of the one which such necessity has demanded. The correct and general principle therefore is that if the debt is not for the benefit of the estate, then the manager has no power either of mortgage or sale of that estate in order to meet such a debt. An exception has, however, been made to cover the case of mortgage or sale by the father in consideration of an antecedent debt. The exception should not be extended and should be very carefully guarded. It is founded on the necessity of protecting the rights of third persons, say the purchasers of the property who have taken their title for onerous consideration and in good faith. The father and managing member of a joint Hindu family entered into a contract for the sale of family property to one U for the discharge of an antecedent debt. A sale-deed was actually drawn up in his favour for a consideration of Rs. 13,000, the amount of the antecedent debt. Thereupon D instituted a suit and obtained a decree for pre-emption in respect of the sale-deed so executed by the father. By the time D got the decree the antecedent debt to discharge which the sale-deed in favour of U had been executed had been discharged. The father executed, after the decree, a sale-deed conveying the property to D for the sum of Rs. 13,000; and the said sum was appropriated by the father to his own use and for purposes not binding on the family.

Held, that the sale to D was not for an antecedent debt and was not binding on the undivided sons of the alienor.

The doctrine of "antecedent debt" has been carried for; if the sale in this case should be held to be for an antecedent debt, it would mean that a contract for a loan, which never was completed, to pay off a previous debt otherwise discharged, would become "an antecedent debt." The contention is, on the face of it, absurd. (Mr. Ameer Ali.) JAWAHIR SINGH v. UDAI PARKASH.

the credit obtainable from immoveable assets which do not personally belong to him but are joint family property. To give true effect to the doctrine of antecedency in time, there must be also real dissociation in fact between the debt and the alienation in consideration thereof. Wherever such antecedency is found to be unreal and is merely a cover for what is essentially a breach of trust, on the part of the father, the courts must deny effect to a mortgage so brought into existence. The correct view is that joint family property cannot be effectively sold or charged in such a manner as to bind the issue of the father except where the sale or charge has been made in order to discharge an obligation not only antecedently incurred, but incurred wholly apart from the ownership of the joint estate or the security afforded or supposed to be available by such joint estate. On 4th March, 1908, S, the father and manager of a joint Hindu family, mortgaged to the appellant and another ancestral and joint family property. The whole of the money raised under that mortgage was employed in paying off two earlier mortgages on the same property. There was nothing to show for what purpose the money raised by the two earlier mortgages had been used or that the debt then incurred was incurred wholly irrespective of the family property.

Held, reversing the Courts below, that the mortgage of 4th March, 1908, was made in order to pay off an antecedebt debt, namely, the two older mortgages and consequently bound the estate.

The case of Sahu Ram must not be taken to decide more than what was necessary for the judgment, namely, that the incurring of the debt was there the creation of the mortgage itself and that there was no antecedency either in time or in fact. Moreover, if proper attention is paid to the word "incurred", their Lordships think that it will be seen to be a proper interpretation of the sentence which has caused the doubts. ———Mortgage invalid at its date if can be an.

It was argued that although by the rules of the Mithakshara law a mortgage is at its date an invalid deed in so far as purporting to encumber the joint family property, yet when it purports to become the consideration for a sale it then becomes a just and a legal consideration on the principle of "antecedent debt." The family property could not be affected by such an invalid mortgage, but it could be sold next year or next day to the mortgagee for an "antecedent" debt, namely, the mortgage debt itself! Thus by turning the "antecedent debt" simply into a debt "antecedent" to the sale, the whole doctrine of antecedent debt is reduced ad absurdum, the principle of the Mithakshara law is circumvented, and the rights of the junior members of a Hindu family are no longer protected, but can be easily destroyed. Their Lordships cannot hold that this is in accordance with law.

As to the matter of the antecedency of debts, it is clear beyond question that the antecedency is antecedency to the mortgage itself. And it is more than that—it is disconnection with the mortgage in fact as well as in law. In no other way can the law of Indian joint family property protect itself against being undermined.

Joint family estate cannot be effectively sold or charged in such a manner as to bind the issue of the father, except where the sale or charge has been made in order to discharge an obligation not only antecedently incurred, but incurred wholly apart from the ownership of the joint estate or the security afforded or supposed to be available by such joint estate. The exception in favour of alienation for antecedent debts applies only to the case where the father's debts have been incurred irrespective of the credit obtainable from immovable assets which do not personally belong to him, but are joint family property. ———Sale if for—Mortgage with possession for term invalid—Sale within period fixed for amount due under, and for another sum not used for family purpose or necessity—Effect.

A joint Hindu family governed by the Mithakshara law of the N.-W. Provinces consisted of A, his two sons and his three grandsons by the said sons. In 1904, A executed a mortgage over the family property for Rs. 8,000. The debt of Rs. 8,000 was, with the possible exception of Rs. 1,000, neither incurred nor used for family purposes or necessity, nor was it an antecedent debt.

The mortgage of 1904, was, by its terms, a usufructuary mortgage, and was for the period of ten years running from its date. It was stipulated that possession and occupation should be given to the mortgagee in lieu of interest and that the mortgage was redeemable on payment of the principal amount at any time after the expiry of the ten years fixed.

Notwithstanding the ten years' provision of the usufructuary mortgage, A within 3 years from its date sold his equity of redemption in the property to the mortgagees for Rs. 13,500. Rs. 8,000 out of the Rs. 13,500 represented the amount due under the usufructuary mortgage, and the balance was received in cash. The said balance was neither incurred nor used for any family purpose or necessity. There was thus no legal necessity for either transaction,

In this case the suit was brought by a Hindu son to set aside a deed of sale of ancestral property executed by his father, and to recover possession of the whole of the property alienated. The law applicable to the case was the Mithila law, which was very similar to the law administered under the Mithakshara. The father was alive and was made a defendant in the suit. The sale was found to be for an antecedent debt, and the debt was found to be neither illegal nor immoral. Though the father was alive, their Lordships upheld the sale on the footing that the son was under a pious obligation to pay a debt of his father which was neither illegal nor immoral, and that the ancestral property, including the son's share, was liable for such debt (328, 331-2). If the point was open, there would be much to be said in favour of a position which seems consonant with common sense. But a long train of authorities have settled the question. ———Freedom from—Test—Nature of debt or nature of estate sought to be made liable.

Though an estate be ancestral, it may, under the Hindu law, be charged for some purposes against the heir, for the father's debt, by the father. Unless the debt was of such a nature that it was not the duty of the son to repay it, the discharge of it, even though it affected ancestral estate, would still be an act of pious duty in the son. By the Hindu law, the freedom of the son from the obligation to discharge the father's debt, has respect to the nature of the debt, and not the nature of the estate, whether ancestral or acquired by the creator of the debt. ———Ancestral property which descends to a father under the Mithakshara law is not exempted from liability to pay his debts because a son is born to him. It would be a pious duty on the part of the son to pay his father's debts, and it being the pious duty of the son to pay his father's debts, the ancestral property, in which the son as the son of his father acquires an interest by birth, is liable to the father's debts. The freedom of the son to discharge the father's debt has respect to the nature of the debt and not to the nature of the estate, whether ancestral or acquired by the creator of the debt (331).

If the debt of the father had been contracted for an immoral purpose, the son might not be under any pious obligation to pay it, and he might possibly object to those estates which had come to the father as ancestral property being made liable to the debt (331). The proposition that no member of a Hindu joint family subject to the law of the Mithila school is bound to pay the debt of an ancestor which was contracted jointly by the ancestor with another member of the joint family is a startling one. Assuming that it was a debt which, if contracted by the father or grandfather alone, it was the pious duty of the son or of the grandson to pay, it is difficult to understand on what principle of the law of the Mithila school it was not a debt which it was the pious duty of the son or grandson to pay if it were contracted jointly with another who was a member of the joint family.

Held, accordingly, affirming the High Court, that a debt which was charged by a bond on the joint property of the family by each of the heads of the then four branches of the joint family, and other members of the family, who were their sons or grandsons was binding on the joint family property. It seems to be clear upon the authorities that if the debt of the father had been a mere bond debt, not binding on the sons by virtue of their liability to pay their father's debts, and no sufficient proceedings had been taken to enforce it in the father's lifetime, his interest in the property would have survived on his death to his sons, so that it could not afterwards be reached by the creditor in their hands (108-9). ———Sale pursuant to—Death of father between dates of—Creditor's rights in case of—Sale not binding on son.

In execution of a decree obtained against a Hindu governed by the Bengal Mithakshara on a mortgage bond executed by him, mouzah B, one of the mortgaged properties, was attached and was advertised for sale. After the attachment but before the actual sale, the mortgagor died, and the sale was held subsequently, the lot sold being described as "the eight anna share of the judgment-debtor in mouzah B, part of the mortgaged property."

Before, however, the execution purchasers were put into possession, the undivided sons of the mortgagor sued for the confirmation of their possession in the eight annas of mouzah B, and to have the mortgage, the decree thereon, and the sale in execution thereof, set aside. The sale was found not to affect the son's interests in the joint ancestral estate. The question was whether the sons were entitled to any and what relief as regards the father's share in the mouzah B, in view of the fact that the father had died before the sale in execution.

Held, that, at the time of the father's death, the execution proceedings under which mouzah B had been attached and ordered to be sold had gone so far as to constitute, in favour of the judgment-creditor, a valid charge upon the land, to the extent of A's undivided share and interest therein, which could not be defeated by his death before the actual sale; that the effect of the execution sale was to transfer to the respondents the undivided share in eight annas of mouzah B, which had formerly belonged to A, in his lifetime; and that, notwithstanding his death, the respondents were entitled to work out the rights which they had thus acquired by means of a partition (109). One Mrs. C, complaining that G, the head of joint Hindu family, had wrongfully ousted her from land held under lease from him, sued him to recover possession and mesne profits. The lease had been granted as part of an arrangement under which G took a loan of Rs. 45,000 from Mr. C, the predecessor in title of Mrs. C. In the suit of Mrs. C, a decree was made according to the prayer of her plaint, and the sum of Rs. 32,318 was awarded to her for mesne profits. In satisfaction of that decree a portion of the family ancestral land was brought to sale by execution proceedings.

In a suit by G's son to set aside the execution sale, a discussion arose as to the nature of the debt for which the property was sold, whether the debt originated in the loan of Rs. 45,000, or in G's receipt of the mesne profits for which the decree was given.

Held, that the new debt for which the decree was made was the foundation of the sale (18-9). (Lord Hobhouse.) MUSSAMUT NANOMI BABUASIN v. MODUN MOHUN.

The interest which is purchased at a sale in execution of a decree obtained against the father of a Mithakshara joint family of his right, title and interest in an item of family property is not the share of the father at that time in the property ; but it is the right which the father, the debtor, would have to a partition, and what would come to him upon the partition being made. What the father was entitled to and what the purchaser became entitled to, was what the father would get if a partition had been made (29). The purchaser at such a sale acquires the share and interest of the father, and is entitled to take proceedings to have it ascertained by partition (30). The purchaser becomes entitled to the share in the property which the father would have got, treating it as if the sale was to operate as a partition at that time (29). The father and managing member of a joint Hindu family governed by the Mithakshara law wrongfully ousted a lessee from land held under lease from him, whereupon the lessee sued the father and obtained a decree for mesne profits against him. In execution of that decree the share of the whole of the joint family was sold and was purchased by a third party. The debt for which the sale was held was a joint family debt. The execution and sale proceedings were such that the purchaser must have thought that he was buying the entirety. All the parties thought the same.

In a suit brought by the undivided sons of the judgment-debtor praying that either the execution sale might be wholly set aside, or that they might recover possession of the land and that the execution purchaser might be put to take proceedings on partition, held, that the authority of Deendyal's case did not bind the Court to hold that nothing but the father's co parcenery interest passed by the sale, and that the sale in execution was of the entirety of the estate (18-9). C obtained a decree against M, a Hindu, for the realisation of a sum of money out of the property mortgaged to him by M, viz., "My rights and interest in 6 pie out of 5a. 4p. of the entire 16 annas" of the joint family estate of M and his son.

The sale was fixed for 5—1—1875. On 4—1—1875, the plaintiff, M's undivided son, instituted a suit against C and M claiming that "the ancestral property of the plaintiff which he has inherited from his grandfather ought not to be sold in satisfaction of such illegal and personal debts" of M; and he prayed for a declaration protecting his estate.

On the next day the plaintiff's pleader presented a petition in the execution proceeding, stating that the 5a. 4p. share of the estate aforesaid, "which is the ancestral property of my client, is to be sold to-day in this Court." The petition then stated the suit commenced the day before, and prayed postponement of the sale till the suit should be disposed of.

That petition was rejected, not on the ground that the thing to be sold was only the share of M, but on the ground that "the plaintiff is at liberty, in case of the sale taking place, to make the purchaser a defendant in his suit, so that he (the purchaser) may defend the right purchased by him."

The sale certificate which was issued to the vakil of C, after stating that all the "right, interest, and connection which the judgment-debtor had in the property" had been purchased "from the decree-holder," and "that in future the certificate shall be considered as a good evidence of transfer of the right and interest of the judgment-debtor," described the property thus :—

"Five annas four pie of mouzah U, which belonged to the judgment-debtor, M, is sold for Rs. 10,000."

Held, reversing the High Court and restoring the Sub-Judge, that the thing put up to sale and bought was the entirety of the estate, and not merely the father's share in it. (Lord Hobhouse.) RAI BABU MAHABIR PERSHAD v. RAI MARKUNDA NATH SAHAI. (1889) 17 I. A. 11 = 17 C. 584 = 5 Sar. 489.

———Right, title and interest—Description of property sold as.

In a case in which, in execution of a money-decree against a Hindu father, the Court intended to sell, and the Court did sell, the whole estate, and not merely the share of the father therein, the High Court held that the sale affected the interests of the father only, because of the ruling of the Privy Council in Hurdey Narain's case "that a sale in execution of a money-decree of the right, title and interest of an Hindu father, will affect only the interests of the father."

Held, that the High Court was wrong in its view of the effect of the decision in Hurdey Narain's case (5).

The High Court seems to have acted on the rule so laid down as a rigid rule of law, apparently applicable to this particular case. But the distinction is obvious. In Hurdey Narain's case, all the documents shewed that the Court intended to sell, and that it did sell nothing but the father's share—the share and interest that he would take on partition, and nothing beyond it—and this tribunal in that case puts it entirely upon the ground that everything shewed that the thing sold was " whatever rights and interests the said judgment-debtor had in the property" and nothing else (5). ———The words " right, title and interest " are ambiguous. To find out what passes under an execution sale of the "right, title and interest" of a judgment-debtor, it is necessary to examine the facts and circumstances which led to the introduction of those words, and it is of the utmost importance that the substance and not the mere technicalities, of the transaction should be regarded.

In this case it appeared that after an order for sale in execution of a decree against a Hindu father and before the actual sale, his sons instituted separate suits for a declaration that the property directed to be sold was the property of the joint family of themselves and their father and that the decree against him being for debts contracted for immoral purposes could not affect their shares. They also applied for an interim injunction restraining the sale. The court declined to grant the injunction but directed the insertion in the sale notices of the words " right, title and interest " of the judgment-debtor in suit property, expressly adding that it did so because their insertion would not affect the case of either party. Their Lordships therefore held that the whole property passed by the sale notwithstanding the description of the property as " the right, title and interest" of the father. (*Lord Buckmaster, L. SALE IN—INTEREST PASSING UNDER—FATHER'S SHARE ONLY.

Various decrees were passed against the respondent's father, the late zamindar of Sivagiri. When execution was issued under the decree, and an attachment was made, during the lifetime of the deceased, the proclamation expressly stated that all that was to be sold was the life interest of the deceased. A petition put in by the creditor praying that that notification might be altered and that a fresh advertisement might be made expunging the words "during his lifetime" was rejected during the lifetime of the deceased, on the ground that what was intended by the decree to be sold, and what could be sold under the decree, was only the interest of the deceased during his lifetime. The sale was postponed at the instance of the creditors, in consequence of the illness of the deceased, because they represented that, as the estate was to be sold only for the father's interest during his lifetime, the sale would not fetch so much during his illness as it would if he were in a better state of health.

The late zemindar then died. No fresh attachment was made. The sale took place after his death upon the attachment which had been made during his lifetime. The proclamation stated that the property was to be sold only for the interest of the father.

After the father's death, the court allowed the respondent, notwithstanding the attachment to take possession of the estate, stating that all that was to be sold was the life interest of the father. The purchase at the sale was made by the creditors themselves benami in the name of their clerk and for a small sum.

For a debt due, partly on account of a mortgage, and partly for further advances, by the father and managing member of a joint Hindu family, a simple money decree was obtained against him. In execution of that decree the entire eight annas share belonging to the family was attached; but what was sold to and purchased by the execution purchaser, who was the decree-holder himself, was merely the right, title and interest of the father in the said eight annas.

Held that what was sold and purchased at the execution sale was not the whole of the eight annas share, but only the father's right and interest therein (28-9).

This case is distinguishable from the cases where the father, being a member of a joint family governed by the Mithakshara law had mortgaged the family property to secure a debt, and the decree had been obtained upon the mortgage and for a realization of the debt by means of the sale of the mortgaged property (28). This case is precisely like the case of Deendyal Lal v. Jugdeep Narain Singh (29). (Sir Barnes Peacock.) BABOO HURDEY NARAIN SAHU v. BABOO ROODER PERKASH MISSER. (1883) 11 I. ———Mortgage decree.

The question was as to the amount of interest acquired by the purchaser at an execution sale of joint family estate subject to the Mithakshara law in proceedings to which the father alone was a party, whether the purchaser acquired the entirety of the property or the father's co-parcenery interest therein alone.

Held that the purchaser acquired the father's co-parcenary interest alone, in view of the following circumstances :—

(1) that the mortgage sued upon was only of the father's right and interest in the property ;

(2) that the decree and the sale certificate purported to affect only such inteeest ;

(3) that the sons were not parties to the proceedings; and

(4) that the price paid by the purchaser was nearer the value of the father's share than of the entirety. (Lord Hobhouse.) SIMBHUNATH PANDAY v. GOLAB SINGH. (1887) 14 I. A. 77 = 14 C. 572 = 5 Sar. 5.

He took no proceedings to enforce that decree, which was in the form of an ordinary decree for money, against the property especially hypothecated, but caused " the rights and proprietary and mokurruri title and share of T, the judgment-debtor" in other joint family property to be put up for sale for the amount due under the decree, and himself became the purchaser of that property. He also succeeded in taking possession of the whole of that property.

Thereupon the respondent instituted the suit out of which the appeal arose for the recovery of the whole of the property which was purchased and taken possession of by the appellant. T was joined as a defendant.

Held that, whatever might be the nature of the debt for which the appellant obtained his decree, he could not be taken to have acquired by the execution sale more than the right, title and interest of the judgment-debtor (251).

If the appellant had sought to go further, and to enforce his debt against the whole property, and the co-sharers therein who were not parties to the bond, he ought to have framed his suit accordingly, and have made those co-sharers parties to it. By the proceedings which he took he could not get more than what was seized and sold in execution, viz., the right, title and interest of the father (251). (Sir James W. Colvile.) DEENDYAL LAL v. JUGDEEP NARAIN SINGH. (1877) 4 I. A. 247 = 3 C. 198 (204-5) = 1 C. L. R. 49 = 3 Sar. 730 = 3 Suth. 468.

———Under the Hindu law, ancestral property in a joint Hindu family may be made liable for the father's debts, unless they can be shown to have been for an immoral or illegal consideration. This rule, however, does not always apply. The creditor's conduct, for example, may evidence an intention not to resort to such a right, whereby, after all, one man's property is taken to pay another man's debt. This is peculiarly so where the form of his proceedings points to an election to seek execution against his own debtor's interest, and no further.

Where the certificate of sale recited that the decree-holder had bought "the right and interest of the judgment-debtor" (the father) "to be allotted by division, namely, by a separate allotment of 152 bighas of land . . . . for the purpose of cultivation", and it did not appear that he claimed execution at any time against the family property generally, held, that there was strong evidence of an intention to proceed against the debtor's interest only. In deciding what was the nature of the right acquired under a sale of family property held in execution of a decree obtained against a Hindu father, the question to be considered is not what the Court could have done, or what they ought to have done, but what they did, what was put up for sale, and what was purchased. If what was put up for sale was merely the estate which the father had in his lifetime, then what the purchaser purchased was only that interest (88-9). Each case in which the question is as to the amount of interest acquired by the purchaser at an execution sale where the sale relates to a joint family estate subject to the Mithakshara law, and the father of the family alone has been party to the proceedings must depend on its own circumstances. It appears to their Lordships that in all the cases, at least the recent cases, the inquiry has been what the parties contracted about if there was a conveyance, or what the purchaser had reason to think he was buying if there was no conveyance, but only a sale in execution of a money decree (83). ———What amounts to—Order declining to adjudicate upon son's objections in execution proceedings and referring him to suit—Purchase with knowledge of—Effect of.

The suit was by the undivided sons of a Hindu governed by the Bengal Mithakshara law to set aside a mortgage executed by their father, the decree obtained on foot thereof, and the sale of joint ancestral property held in execution thereof, and to be confirmed in their possession of the property sold in execution. The High Court found that the mortgage debt was not binding on the sons or on the ancestral immoveable estate in their hands, but nevertheless dismissed the son's suit upon the principal ground, viz., that, upon the authority of the decision of the Privy Council in Mudhan Thakoor v. Kantoo Lall, the execution purchasers were to be treated on the footing of purchasers for value, without notice.

It appeared, however, that, before the execution sale, the sons presented a petition to the executing Court objecting to the sale, that that Court refused to adjudicate upon the claim in an execution proceeding, and accordingly allowed the sale to take place, but made an order referring the sons to a regular suit for the establishment of their rights, and that the execution purchasers must be taken to have had notice, actual or constructive, of the son's objections, and the order made upon them.

the two undivided sons of the mortgagor instituted a suit for the confirmation of their possession in the eight annas of mouzah B, and to have the mortgage bond executed by their father, the decree thereon, and the sale in execution thereof, set aside.

It was found that neither the mortgage bond nor the execution sale affected the interests of the sons in the joint ancestral estate, and that by their execution purchase the purchasers acquired only the undivided share in eight annas of mouzah B, which had belonged to the mortgagor (father) in his lifetime.

Held, that the proper decree to be passed in such a case was one declaring that by their purchase the execution purchasers acquired only the one undivided third share in the eight-anna share of mouzah B, which formerly belonged to A, with such power of ascertaining the extent of such third part or share by means of a partition as A possessed in his lifetime ; and ordering that the plaintiffs (the sons of A) be confirmed in the possession of the said eight-anna share of mouzah B, subject to such proceedings as the respondents might take in order to enforce their rights above declared (109-110). SALE IN—SON'S SUIT TO RECOVER ENTIRE PROPERTY SOLD FROM PURCHASER AT—DECREE TO BE PASSED IN, ON ITS BEING FOUND THAT PURCHASER ACQUIRED ONLY FATHER'S SHARE IN PROPERTY SOLD.

———Form of—Restoration of entire property to son with declaration of rights of purchaser—Decree for.

In execution of a decree obtained against a Hindu father, joint family property was sold and purchased by the decree-holder himself. In a suit brought by the respondent, the undivided son of the judgment-debtor for the recovery of the whole property from the decree-holder purchaser, the father being also a party-defendant, it was found that by his purchase the latter acquired only the right, title, and interest of the father in the property sold. The High Court by its decree ordered that the respondent should obtain possession from the purchaser of the whole property sold for the benefit of the joint family.

Held, that the decree below ought not to be interfered with so far as it directed the possession of the property to be restored to the respondent ; but that it should be varied by adding a declaration that the decree-holder-purchaser, as purchaser at the execution sale, had acquired the share and interest of the father in the property purchased, and was entitled to take such proceedings as he should be advised to have that share and interest ascertained by partition (255-6). The High Court made a decree which was in effect a decree for partition whereby the father's share of the property in suit was left to remain with the execution purchaser, and the remainder of the property was given to the other members of the family according to their shares.

Held, that, though the decree of the High Court might have gone beyond what was necessary or proper, there was no ground for altering it (30).

The decree ought in strictness to have turned the execution purchaser out of the whole of the property and left him to demand a partition. The actual decree of the High Court is more favourable to him, because it allows him to retain possession of the share which he would have been entitled to if a partition had been made (30). If the father's debt was of a nature to support a sale of the entirety of the family estate, he might legally have sold it without suit, or the creditor might legally procure a sale of it by suit. All the sons can claim is that, not being parties to the sale or execution proceedings, they ought not to be barred from trying the fact or the nature of the debt in a suit of their own. Assuming they have such a right, it will avail them nothing unless they can prove that the debt was not such as to justify the sale (18). ———Where sons claim against a purchaser of an ancestral estate under an execution against their father upon a debt contracted by him, it is necessary for the sons to prove that the debt was contracted for an immoral purpose, and it is not necessary for the creditors to show that there was a proper inquiry, or to prove that the money was borrowed in a case of necessity (105).

In a suit brought on behalf of minor sons to recover possession of ancestral joint family property sold in execution of a decree against their father, the Courts below found that the plaintiffs had not proved that the mortgage bond on foot of which the decree under execution was passed was given for moneys advanced for immoral purposes. Nevertheless, they decreed to the sons the possession of their shares in the suit property on the ground that the lenders had not made proper inquiries to ascertain whether there was any actual necessity for the loans.

SALE OF ENTIRETY OF FAMILY ESTATE IN—SON'S SUIT IMPEACHING DECREE AND SALE ON GROUND OF IMMORALITY OF DEBT—FAILURE TO PROVE SAME.

The appellant, the bona fide holder of a promissory note executed by a zemindar, obtained a money-decree therein against the zemindar. In execution of that decree the appellant took proceedings to have the zemindary attached and sold. The respondent, the son of the Zemindar, intervened, and he sought by petition an order that his interest in the zemindary should be excluded from the sale, and that the sale should be made subject to his right. His objection was, however, over-ruled, the proceedings towards a sale went on, and the thing proposed and intended to be sold, and actually sold, was not the father's share but the whole interest in the zemindary itself.

Thereupon the respondent instituted the suit out of which the appeal arose against his father and the appellant (the decree-holder-purchaser) for a declaration that the promissory note in question was given for immoral and illegal purposes, and that the sale of the zemindary in execution of the decree thereon was invalid and illegal as against the respondent. He never contended that no more than his father's interest was sold. His case was that the whole zemindary was sold out and out ; he impeached the debt which led to the sale, and asserted that the decree founded on it could not bind his interests.

The courts below found on the evidence that the amount of the promissory note was a debt binding on the respondent, that he would be liable for the same to the extent of the assets coming to him by descent from his father, and that his interest in the zemindary was liable, and might be sold for the satisfaction of that debt. The court held, nevertheless, reversing the sub-judge, that only the father's interest must be held to have passed by the sale, and they did so because in their opinion the decision of the Privy Council in Hurdey Narain's case constrained them to do so,

Held, agreeing with the sub-judge, that the respondent's whole suit failed (4-5).

The respondent based his case upon the impeachment of the pro-note debt, and upon that alone, and failing in that allegation and that impeachment, the whole suit fails. That being the case there might have been a sale of this estate under this decree, including the whole interest or of so much as was necessary. The evidence shows that the court intended to sell, and that the court did sell. the whole estate and not any partial interest in it (5). The relief formally claimed was recovery of possession of the properties which had been allotted to the share of the 1st respondent. The father was made a defendant in the suit.

On objection raised to the form of the suit, on the ground that it should have been one for partition, held that, the basis of the appellant's claim being that they were still entitled to the property as a joint undivided estate, and desired to enjoy it as such, the suit as framed was sustainable (222). A lease was granted to the appellant by the father of the 1st respondent and the manager of the joint family. Contemporaneously with the lease two other documents were executed; one was a sale of a part of the family property and the other a mortgage for Rs. 50,000, both in favour of the appellant. The lease deed was so drafted that it should at the same time serve the purpose of a lease and a collateral security for the mortgage debt, for the terms provided that out of the rent payable by the lessee under its terms the interest that was due to him upon his mortgage debt should be deducted, the result being that after all the different payments had been made as the lease provided the gross amount of Rs. 16,775 rent was reduced to Rs. 3,804 per annum.

Proceedings were separately instituted for setting aside the contemporaneous mortgage and the sale, and these ended by a compromise, the effect of which was that all that the 1st respondent could reasonably claim as his share of the family estate was released from the mortgage debt, and the sale deeds were set aside. That compromise did not deal with the lease, which was made the subject of the subsequent proceedings out of which the appeal arose.

The lease was really in effect a collateral security for the mortgage debt, and the result was that the 1st respondent's property was put into pledge to secure the repayment of the moneys in respect of debts improvidently contracted by his father. The appellants offer to make all necessary alterations in the lease, in order to reduce it to a proper and reasonable form, is one that cannot be considered for the purpose of influencing the decision. It is impossible to regard the provision for the payment of the interest and any other provision that might be regarded as objectionable in the lease as in the nature of an independent bargain between the lessee and the lessor which can be cut out and separated from the general structure of the lease, and then can be so dealt with that the 1st respondent's property is relieved from these offensive provisions. The lease must be regarded as a whole. It must be regarded as it was drawn on the date it bore. (Lord Buckmaster.) NARAIN DAS v. ABINASH CHANDAR. (1922) 27 C. W. N. 299 = 21 A. L. ———A suit to enforce a mortgage executed by the joint managers of a joint Hindu family was instituted against, amongst others, the sons of certain of the mortgagors. The mortgage was not made for any such necessity as would justify such a mortgage, and it was not made for an antecedent debt. It was contended that the sons were under a pious obligation to pay their father's debts and that that fact would validate the mortgage.

Held, following Sahu Ram's case, that the mortgage was not binding on the family property.

In Sahu Ram's case it was laid down in effect that joint property could not be alienated as against co-sharers by way of mortgage or otherwise, except for necessity, or for payment of an actual antecedent debt, quite distinct from the debt incurred in the mortgage itself, and that in consequence the transaction in that case could not stand, and it was added that the mere circumstance of a pious obligation does not validate the mortgage. INVALID MORTGAGE—VALIDITY OF, TO EXTENT OF FATHER'S SHARE.

———Bengal Mithakshara—Law under.

If the law of the Presidency of Fort William were identical with that of Madras, a mortgage executed by a Hindu father In his lifetime, as a security for a debt not binding upon his sons or upon their shares in the ancestral immoveable estate, might operate after his death as a valid charge upon the property comprised in the mortgage to the extent of his own then share. The difficulty is that, so far as the decisions have yet gone, the law, as understood in Bengal, does not recognize the validity of such an alienation. It is not necessary in this case to determine that vexed question, which their former decisions have hitherto left open (109). (*Sir James W.
